

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

Wirt ADAMS, State Revenue Agent,
v.

YAZOO & MISSISSIPPI VALLEY RAIL-ROAD COMPANY et al.

(77 Miss. 194.)

1. The phrase "such terms as they may agree upon," in a statute authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies, relates to the mere administrative details attending consolidation, and conveys no substantive powers or rights.
2. A consolidation of the stock of corporations results uniformly and necessarily in the creation of a new corporation.
3. A consolidation which results in the formation of a new company, and not merely a merger of the constituent companies, retaining their separate existences, is authorized by statutes providing for the consolidation of companies under the name of one of them, without saying it shall be under its charter, and giving to the new company all the benefits, rights, franchises, and property of the original companies.

4. The right of corporations to consolidate is a grant of a corporate franchise subject to Const. § 180, so that any exemption of one of the old companies from taxation is cut off, although § 181 provides for the continuation of exemptions to which corporations "are legally entitled" at the adoption of the Constitution, and § 279 of the schedule provides for the continuation of the rights and charters of corporations.
5. A decision as to an exemption from taxation, in a case between the sheriff of a county and a railroad company, is not res

I. Introduction.

Before entering upon the discussion of the subject of corporate taxation in the United States as affected by that clause in article I, § 10, of the Federal Constitution forbidding every state to pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract, it will be useful to take a preliminary survey of the litigation between the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company and the public officers of Mississippi, of which the principal case is a part. The cases in the group are typical. In them were decided the main questions that arise in cases in this class.

The original act of the Mississippi legislature incorporating the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company (February 17, 1882) contained (§ 8) an exemption from taxation. It provided: That, in order to encourage the investment of capital in the works which said company is hereby authorized to construct and maintain, and to make certain in advance of such investment, and as an inducement and consideration therefor, the taxes and burdens which this state will and will not impose thereon, it is hereby declared that said company, its stock, its railroads and appurtenances and all its property in this state necessary or incident to the full exercise of all the powers herein granted,—not to include compresses or oil mills,—shall be exempt from taxation for a term of twenty years from the completion of said railroad to the Mississippi river, but not to extend beyond twenty-five years from the date of the approval of this act; and when the period of exemption herein prescribed shall have expired the property of said railroad may be taxed at the same rate as other property in this state.

Taxes having been assessed against this railroad before its construction had progressed as far as the Mississippi river, the company judicata in a case between a state revenue agent and a different railroad company, although it may be persuasive under the doctrine of stare decisis.

6. A decision as to the taxes of one year is not res judicata as to the taxes for another year.
7. The legislature not only could but was required to impose taxes on the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit, just as and when it would tax the property of individuals, under Const. 1869, art. 12, § 13, providing that the property of such corporations "shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals," and § 20, providing for equal and uniform taxation of all property according to value.
8. The doctrine of stare decisis cannot be invoked in favor of decisions on former statutes which were merely similar to, but not identical with, one under review.
9. A decision that a statute constitutes a contract, and that an act repealing it is void, is not an estoppel to a subsequent decision holding that the former statute itself is unconstitutional.

10. A constitutional provision adopted from another state must be construed according to the established meaning of the provision that had been acquired in the state from which it was taken.

On motion to strike from files.

11. The court has a right to file a new and fuller opinion containing every reason for the decision that was included in the first opinion and an additional reason also, although the cause has been remanded to a lower court.
12. The constitutional provision as to due process of law is not violated by filing a new and fuller opinion after the cause has been remanded to a lower court.

brought its bill in chancery against the sheriffs and tax collectors of the several counties through which its line extended for an injunction against their collection. Upon demurrer to the bill it was dismissed, and the corporation appealed to the Mississippi supreme court. That tribunal affirmed the judgment.

Planting itself upon the general principles that legislation which relieves any species of property from its due proportion of the burdens of government must be so clear that there can be neither reasonable doubt nor controversy in regard to its meaning: that statutes exempting persons or property from taxation, being in derogation of the sovereign authority and of common right, are to be strictly construed; and that, as taxation is the rule, and exemption the exception, the intention to create an exception must be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms, and it cannot be taken to be intended when the language of the statute on which it depends is doubtful or uncertain,—the court held that the exemption did not begin before the completion of the road to the Mississippi river: that when the road was finished that far the exemption would continue for twenty years thereafter, provided it had not taken more than five years to build. If it had, then, inasmuch as the exemption was limited to twenty-five years from the passage of the act of incorporation, it would be shortened by the extra time consumed in construction. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Thomas, 65 Miss. 553, 5 So. 108.

This decision was affirmed on writ of error by the Supreme Court of the United States. 132 U. S. 174, 33 L. ed. 302, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 68.

The affirmance was grounded upon the above-stated principles, and the case was declared controlled by that of Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 29 L. ed. 770, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

About the same time the railroad brought its bill in equity in the United States circuit court for the southern district of Mississippi for an injunction to restrain the collection of levee taxes. A demurrer to this bill was sustained, and the bill dismissed upon the same ground. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Levee Comrs. 37 Fed. 24. Affirmed in 132 U. S. 190, 33 L. ed. 308. 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 74.

The railroad was equally unsuccessful in its next case, a suit brought to enjoin the state revenue agent and the railroad commission from proceeding further in the assessment of its property for back taxes which the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad Co., whose property and franchise it had acquired by consolidation, had escaped. No question of contract was raised in that case, but the railroad denied the jurisdiction of the commission to assess back taxes for the stated years on the ground that it was not, until subsequently, clothed with any power to assess railroad taxes. Yazoo v. M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams, 73 Miss. 648, 19 So. 91.

The railroad failed also in its defense of an action by the state revenue agent to recover back taxes due the municipalities of Jackson, and other cities, villages, and towns. The company insisted that it was exempt from such taxes by virtue of the concluding paragraph in § 8 of its charter, reading: All of said taxes to which the property of said company may be subject in this state, whether for county or state, shall be collected by the treasurer of this state, and paid into the state treasury to be dealt with as the legislature may direct; but said company shall be exempt from taxation by cities and towns. The court held that this provision did not confer an exemption absolute and perpetual from local municipal taxation, but merely the same exemption that the fore part of the section gave from state taxes; to wit, an exemption that did not begin until the road was completed as far as the Mississippi river. 75 Miss. 275, 22 So. 824.

In a subsequent appeal in this case the railroad set up a claim to exemption on the ground that its road was completed to the Mississippi river, not by a physical construction, but in virtue of its consolidation with the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad Company, which had bought out the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railway Company, whose line reached the river. The ruling was that an actual physical building of the appellant's road to the Mississippi river was necessary to earn the exemption. This was the consideration moving to the state for its grant, and a paper or constructive completion to the designated terminus did not satisfy such consideration. 76 Miss. 545, 23 So. 366.

A writ of error to the United States Supreme Court to review this decision was dismissed upon the ground that the Federal question of the impairment of a contract had not been properly raised. 180 U. S. 41, 45 L. ed. 415, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 256.

The court thought the case resolved to this: Whether jurisdiction could be sustained when the only question involved was the construction of a charter or contract, although it ap-

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Hinds County rendered in an action brought to enforce payment of taxes alleged to be due and unpaid for the years 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895; the defendants appealing from so much of the judgment as permitted a recovery for the year 1895; and the plaintiff appealing from so much as denied a recovery for the other years. Reversed on both appeals.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Critz & Beckett, for plaintiff:

For a claim to exemption from taxation to arise at all, the party claiming must affirmatively and clearly bring himself within the language, and within the terms and conditions, of the statute on which the exemption is to take effect. An exemption is not transferable unless by express words, or by an intention clearly manifested by the language of the statute. In both cases all doubts are resolved in favor of the state and against the exemption.

appeared that there were statutes subsequently enacted which might have been, but were not, relied upon as raising a Federal question concerning the construction of the contract. Ibid.

Then came the litigation in the principal case. The Mississippi Constitution of 1869 contained two sections (art. 12, §§ 13 and 20) of supreme importance in this controversy. The one provided that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit should be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals; the other, that taxation should be equal and uniform throughout the state, and that all property should be taxed according to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law.

The supreme court of Mississippi had held that, notwithstanding these provisions, the legislature had power to exempt from taxation corporations and their property for a limited time,—that is to say, that the constitutional requirement that corporate property should be subject to taxation did not require that it should always be subjected to taxation; but that the legislature could not put such property permanently beyond the reach of the taxing power. Its view was that the provisions were mandatory as to the continual liability of corporate property to be taxed, but permissive as to the taxation or exemption thereof at the discretion of the legislature. Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40.

In the case involving the levee taxes, in the Federal court, above cited, Hill, J., expresses the opinion that despite the constitutional provisions referred to the Mississippi legislature was competent to pass laws exempting property from taxation for definite periods, and in so far agrees with and approves the last case. But he differs with the majority in that case in the view that such an exemption was subject to repeal, at the discretion of the legislature, at all times. He admits that such may be the case with respect of private corporations created solely for the profit of their stockholders, in which the public has no interest, but thinks it is not so as to corporations like railroads charged with public duties. A grant of exemption to such a corporation, he thinks, constitutes an irrepealable contract. But he says he can cite no authority for this distinction. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Levee Comrs. 37 Fed. 24, supra.

It was while the Mississippi Constitution of 1869 was in force that the original act of incorporation of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company was passed (February 17, 1882), and the decisions have been noted holding that the exemption thereby granted did not become operative until the road was completed to the Mississippi river; that completion meant an actual physical construction to a terminal on the river; and that the exemption was not earned by the acquisition, through consolidation or otherwise, of another railroad having such a terminal. While, too, that Constitution was in force, there were incorporated several other Mississippi railroads, and these in turn merged by consolidations into the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railway Company. One of these roads, the Mobile & N. W. Railway Company, incorporated by act of July 20, 1870, was granted (§ 21) an exemption whereby the state agreed with said company (and which agreement is irrepealable) that all taxes to which said company shall be subject for the period of thirty years are hereby appropriated and set apart, and shall be applied to the debts and liabilities which the said company may have incurred in the construction of said road, or for money borrowed by said company upon lands, or otherwise, to be used in constructing said road or paying debts incurred by said company in constructing the same, with a proviso that the exemption should cease whenever the annual profits warranted an 8 per cent dividend.

The provisions of this section were extended by an act of August 8, 1870, to other railroads, among which were the Memphis & Vicksburg and the Natchez & Jackson companies.

An act of the same date, incorporating the Memphis & Vicksburg Railway Company, provided (§ 16) that such company should have the right and power to consolidate its stock, property, and franchises with any other road or roads in or out of the state at any time its president and directors might deem proper, and upon such terms as might be consistent with the powers conferred upon it.

The act incorporating the New Orleans, B. R., V. & M. Short Line Railway Company of March 9, 1882, enacted (§ 25) that such company should have power and authority to purchase and hold any connecting railroad, and to operate the same, or to consolidate with any other company under the name of one or both; and that, when such purchase was made or consolidation effected the said company, should be entitled to all the benefits, rights, franchises, lands, and property, of every description, belonging to said road or roads so sold or consolidated.

The two companies just mentioned were by merger agreement consolidated August 12, 1884, into the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railway Company.

March 15, 1884, authorized the Memphis & Vicksburg road to consolidate with any other company or companies, domestic or foreign, so that all the companies so consolidating should be merged into and become one company, and provided that the company so formed by such consolidation should be deemed and held to be a domestic corporation, and should have, enjoy, and possess all the rights, ways, privileges, franchises, property, grants, and immunities which were then possessed by the companies entering into such consolidation as fully as though the same were conferred specially in such act. Another section (5) applied § 21 of the Mobile & Northwestern charter to the company so consolidated.

The original charter of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company of February 17, 1882, authorized that corporation, also, to consolidate with any other railroad company, in or out of Mississippi, upon such terms as the consolidating companies might agree upon, and provided that upon any such consolidation the consolidated company should have and enjoy all the property, rights, privileges, powers, liberties, immunities, and franchises therein granted, but that such consolidation should not have the effect of exempting from taxation the railroad or property owned by the other consolidating company prior to the consolidation, nor of exempting from taxation any property which the consolidated company might, after the consolidation, acquire under the charter of such other company.

And lastly, the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company and the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railway Company were, by act of February 19, 1890, authorized to consolidate under the name of the former, upon such terms as they might agree.

In the situation thus brought about, the Mississippi supreme court decided: (a) That the exemption given by § 21 of the Mobile & Northwestern Railway Company charter was one which the legislature had power to confer; (b) that it did not constitute an irrepealable contract; (c) that it had been legally extended and confirmed to the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railway Co.; and (d) that it inured upon consolidation to the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railway Company. Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33.

In 1890 Mississippi adopted a new constitution. That instrument provided (§ 180) that all existing charters or grants of corporate franchise under which organizations had not in good faith taken place at the time of its adoption should be subject to its provisions; and 60 L. R. A.

The legislature could not grant an irrepealable exemption.

(§ 181) that the property of all private corporations for pecuniary gain should be taxed in the same way and to the same extent as the property of individuals, but with a saving clause continuing in full force and effect tax exemptions to which corporations were legally entitled at the time of its adoption for the period named in their several charters or by general laws unless sooner repealed by the legislature. After the adoption of the new constitution, and on October 24, 1892, articles of consolidation were entered into between the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railway Company and the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company, and the consolidated road took the name of the latter company. The case last cited was decided after this final consolidation, and, beside holding as stated, also held that the last combined company succeeded to the same immunity from taxation on that part of its lines which formerly comprised the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railroad.

This is the history of affairs to the decision in the principal case, which denied all exemption to the railroad and explicitly overruled the prior decisions above cited. Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40, and Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33.

The principal case has now been affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams, 180 U. S. 1, 45 L. ed. 395, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240.

Further futile attempts of this company to escape taxation have, down to the present time, been reported.

In one, no question of impairment of a contract of exemption was involved. The company resisted payment of the taxes sued for upon the ground that in assessing them the constitutional rule of uniformity and equality had been violated, and that the machinery for assessment and collection amounted to a denial of the equal protection of the laws and to a deprivation of property without due process of law in contravention of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution. 77 Miss. 764, 25 So. 355.

Another involved the question whether the Lambert Case was to be regarded as res judicata. It was insisted that overruling it amounted, so far as this railroad was concerned, to a violation of the 14th Amendment. We are earnestly urged in behalf of appellants, said the court, to overrule 77 Miss. 194, 297, 309, 24 So. 200, 317, Affirmed in 180 U. S. 1, 45 L. ed. 395, 21 Sup. Ct. Lambert Case. Careful reconsideration of the Lambert Case has strengthened, rather than shaken, our conviction as to its unsoundness in so far as the exemption in question, if it then existed, passed to the consolidated company. 77 Miss. 780, 28 So. 959, Affirmed in 180 U. S. 26, 45 L. ed. 408, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282.

The latest phase of the litigation reported to date was an action by the Mississippi state revenue agent to recover back taxes for the years 1886 to 1891, inclusive, upon the railroad property formerly owned by the Louisville, New Orleans & Texas Railroad Company, embracing that which had belonged to the Natchez, Jackson & Columbus Railroad Company, and to enforce thereon a lien for the same.

The railroad, among several defenses, invoked the protection of § 21 of the charter of the last-named road, in vain. The court disposed of it by saying: If the legislature, in enacting § 21, exceeded the authority granted by the Constitution, or acted in contravention of the provisions of the Constitution, the action was void and could not confer rights upon anyone. The question was presented thoroughly, was ably discussed, and was exhaustively considered and decided by this court in the principal case and it was there held that such attempt by the legislature to confer a special exemption upon a special person or corporation would violate art. 12, § 13, of the Mississippi Constitution of 1869, and be, therefore, void. "A careful examination of the question there decided confirms us in the correctness of the conclusion then reached, and we adhere to and confirm the same. By the Constitution taxes are imposed upon all property alike owned by either individuals or corporations, and special exemptions to the one or the other were forbidden by the organic law." Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Adams (Miss.) 32 So. 937.

It is not to be expected that there will be any substantial change in the law thus laid down should the controversy continue between this railroad and the state of Mississippi over questions of taxation. The decisions may be taken as settling, so far as the present topic is concerned, the following propositions:

First. That under the Mississippi Constitution of 1869 the legislature lacked power to grant a corporation immunity from taxation; therefore the various grants of exemption to the several railroads were nullities.

Second. That if any one of such grants could be admitted to be within the legislative competency, the benefit of such exemption did not pass to, or vest in, the successor corporation upon consolidation.

Third, and finally. That, even if such grants, or any of them, did descend to the successive consolidated companies that may have merged before the adoption of the new Constitution of 1890, yet, when the final consolidation took place after that Constitution was adopted, there sprang into being a new corporation that was governed altogether by the provisions of the new instrument, and which did not and could not acquire any exemption whatever from taxation.

The exemptions which the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railway Company has hitherto claimed in its own right and in the right of its predecessors are forever lost.

II. Scope of note.

This note is confined to cases relating to the construction and application of special statutory provisions in acts of incorporation, or more general laws whereby particular corporations, actually or supposedly, become entitled, either to absolute exemption from taxes, wholly or in part, or, by the payment of commuted taxes, to freedom from the burdens of all other taxation. Cases involving immunity from state or local taxation because of general statutes that apply to whole classes of corporations, such as railroads, manufacturing companies, and savings banks, whether they provide for exemptions or commutations, are not embraced in this commentary. Neither are questions here discussed that have arisen in respect of land grants in aid of railroads, as to when, how far, and under what circumstances the granted lands become taxable. And no decision is dealt with herein that merely passes upon the taxability of a particular piece, article, or kind of property belonging to a corporation, as being within or without the protection of a contract of exemption or commutation as a part of the corporate franchise.

III. Controlling principles.

a. In general.

It is taken for granted throughout this note, without further citation of authority, that by the famous Dartmouth College Case (Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629) the principle that a corporate charter, act of incorporation, or other grant of corporate powers and privileges constitutes a contract between the state and the corporators within the meaning and protection of the contract clause of the Federal Constitution is so firmly embedded in American jurisprudence as to be no longer disputable. As the United States Supreme Court put it half a century afterwards: "It has been so often decided by this court that a charter of incorporation granted by a state creates a contract between the state and the corporators which the state cannot violate that it would be a work of supererogation to repeat the reasons on which the argument is founded." Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

And it is now equally established that a state may make a valid contract with a corporation for its exemption, complete or partial, from taxation, for a limited time, or perpetually, and that when it does so explicitly and upon consideration in a corporate charter the provision for tax immunity is as sacred from violation, and as binding, as any other part of the grant. New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, 164, 3 L. ed. 303; Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529; Achison v. Huddleson, 12 How. 293, 13 L. ed. 903; *Piqua Branch Bank v. Nield, J., writing for the court in The Delaware Railroad Tax Case, set forth the doctrine of the United States Supreme Court in relation to the above-stated principles, as follows: That the charter of a private corporation is a contract between the state and the corporators, and within the provision of the Constitution prohibiting legislation impairing the obligation of contracts, has been the settled law of this court since the decision in the Dartmouth College Case. Nor does it make any difference that the uses of the corporation are public if the corporation itself be private. The contract is equally protected from legislative interference, whether the public be interested in the exercise of its franchise, or the charter be granted for the sole benefit of its corporators. This doctrine is not controverted by anyone. 60 L. R. A.

Power to consolidate "the stock, property, and franchises" only passes the ordinary right to exist as a corporation, have stock, and run the railroad.

It is the established law; and the question in all cases when it becomes necessary to apply it is whether the particular legislative interference does in fact impair the obligation of the contract: for it is not every kind of legislative interference with the powers, action, and property of the corporation which will have that result. It has also been repeatedly held by this court that the legislature of a state may exempt particular parcels of property, or the property of particular persons or corporations, from taxation either for a specified period or perpetually, or may limit the amount or rate of taxation to which such property shall be subjected. And when such immunity is conferred, or such limit is prescribed by the charter of a corporation, it becomes a part of the contract, and is equally inviolate with its other stipulations. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888.

The same doctrine was again asserted in Hoge v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 U. S. 348, 25 L. ed. 303.

It is unnecessary further to enlarge upon these points.

In construing and interpreting contracts of this class, the courts are guided by a set of principles that have now become fundamental. The rules are especially inflexible with respect of contracts for exemption from, or limited taxation of, corporations. These, in brief, are, chiefly, that taxation is the rule, and exemption the exception; the power of taxation is an essential attribute of sovereignty, necessary and vital to the very existence of government: the whole community is interested in its maintenance unimpaired; it is presumed never to have been surrendered; and the intention to surrender it must be expressed in language so clear and free from ambiguity as to admit of no reasonable doubt. An exemption never arises by implication; it is always restricted to its lowest possible terms; a doubt is fatal to its existence. Every doubt must be resolved in favor of the government and against the claimant of tax immunity. Every contract of exemption from taxation must be construed strictissimi juris.

Over and over again, in almost every possible form of expression, these cardinal canons of construction of contracts for corporate tax exemption have been stated and applied by the courts. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 920; Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. ed. 773; Philadelphia & W. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 376, 13 L. ed. 461;

If there are inconsistent provisions in the charters of the two companies, the consolidated company gets only that which is common to both, or else the power of the consolidated company would be enlarged.

State v. Maine O. R. Co. 66 Me. 488.

The power to consolidate is "the grant of a corporate franchise," and as the consolidation did not take place till after November 1, 1890, any claim of exemption would be cut off.

ances of the United States Supreme Court, and of certain of the state courts in cases in point.

All contracts, says the former tribunal, are to be construed to accomplish the intention of the parties; and in determining their different provisions a liberal and fair construction will be given to the words, either singly or in connection with the subject-matter. It is not the duty of the court by legal subtlety to overthrow a contract, but rather to uphold it and give it effect; and no strained or artificial rule of construction is to be applied to any part of it. If there is no ambiguity, and the meaning of the parties can be ascertained, effect is to be given to the instrument used whether it is a legislative grant or not. In the case of the Charles River Bridge the rules of construction known to the English common law were adopted and applied in the interpretation of legislative grants, and the principle was recognized that charters are to be construed most favorably to the state, and that in grants by the public nothing passes by implication. This court has repeatedly since asserted the same doctrine. The principle is this: That all rights which are asserted against the state must be clearly defined, and not raised by inference or presumption; and if the charter is silent about a power it does not exist. If on a fair reading of the instrument reasonable doubts arise as to the proper interpretation to be given to it those doubts are to be solved in favor of the state; and where it is susceptible of two meanings, the one restricting and the other extending the powers of the corporation, that construction is to be adopted which works the least harm to the state. But if there is no ambiguity in the charter, and the powers conferred are plainly marked, and their limits can be readily ascertained, then it is the duty of the court to sustain and uphold it, and to carry out the true meaning and intention of the parties to it. Any other rule of construction would defeat all legislative grants, and overthrow all other contracts. Binghamton Bridge, 3 Wall. 51, sub nom. Chenango Bridge Co. v. Binghamton Bridge Co. 19 L. ed. 137.

The effort made to restrict the immunity now under consideration to state taxes only, cannot be sustained. The terms used in the grant are so broad, unambiguous, and universal, and the reasons for making them so accordant therewith, that their full and natural import must be given to them. The exemption covers county and city, as well as state, taxes. There are no words used by the legislature qualifying or limiting the extent of the immunity conferred. *Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. b. In the United States Supreme Court.

There is, in cases where it is alleged that a state law impairs the obligation of a contract, a governing principle that forms an exception to the general rule observed by the Supreme Court of the United States in reviewing the decisions of the state courts. That principle is that the court will and must decide for itself whether or not there is a contract as alleged, and, if so, whether or not it has been impaired by the challenged legislation, wholly regardless of the conclusions of the state courts. That exception was early recognized, and has since been consistently observed.

The rule observed by this court, said McLean J., on one occasion, to follow the construction of the statute of the state by its supreme court, is strongly urged. This is done when we are required to administer the laws of the state. The established construction of a statute of the state is received as a part of the statute. But we are called upon in the case before us, not to carry into effect a law of the state, but to test the validity of such a law by the Constitution of the Union. We are exercising an appellate jurisdiction. The decision of the supreme court the exercise of these powers did not possess them. The new company, made by consolidation, succeeded to all their respective rights and powers, as to the road acquired from each. Consolidation did not invest the company with the rights and powers of each charter of the constituents, as to the other road.

If the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company had any power to further consolidate or unite with any other, it arose from § 16 of the charter of the Memphis & Vicksburg, one constituent, and that applied only to the road it contributed in the consolidation, and did not extend to all the road of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company.

Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 376, 13 L. ed. 461; Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. 460, 21 L. ed. 189.

of the state is before us for revision, and if its construction of the contract in question impairs its obligation we are required to reverse its judgment. To follow the construction of a state court in such a case would be to surrender one of the most important provisions of the Constitution. Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369, 14 L. ed. 977.

And Chief Justice Taney, speaking to the same proposition, about the same time, said: But this rule of interpretation is confined to ordinary acts of legislation, and does not extend to the contracts of the state although they should be made in the form of a law. For it would be impossible for this court to exercise any appellate power in a case of this kind unless it was at liberty to interpret for itself the instrument relied on as the contract between the parties. It must necessarily decide whether the words used are words of contract, and what is their true meaning, before it can determine whether the obligation the instrument created has or has not been impaired by the law complained of. And in forming its judgment on this subject it can make no difference whether the instrument claimed to be a contract is in the form of a law passed by the legislature or of a contract or agreement by one of its agents acting under the authority of the state. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416, 14 L. ed. 997.

And Wayne, J., followed a little later with a fuller exposition. This court, said he, has repeatedly said, whenever an occasion has been presented for its expression, that its rule of interpretation has invariably been that the constructions given by the courts of the states to state legislation and to state constitutions have been conclusive upon this court with a single exception, and that is when it has been called upon to interpret the contracts of states, "though they have been made in the forms of law," or by the instrumentality of a state's authorized functionaries in conformity with state legislation. It has never been denied, nor is it now, that the Supreme Court of the United States has an appellate power to revise the judgment of the supreme court of a state whenever such a court shall adjudge that not to be a contract which has been alleged in the forms of legal proceedings by a litigant to be one, within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution which inhibits the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Of what use would the appellate power be to the litigant who feels himself aggrieved by some particular state legislation, if this court could not decide, independently of all adjudication by

It did not act under this power, manifestly. It was by virtue of the ample power conferred by the charter of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company that the consolidation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company was authorized and effected; and the consequence of such consolidation must be determined by the charter authorizing it. Its provision is that the consolidated company shall have and enjoy all the property, rights, privileges, powers, liberties, immunities, and franchises herein granted, etc.; thus carefully providing that the charter of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company should be the measure of the enjoyment of power by the consolidated company.

The Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company had an immunity from taxation, and might have retained it by con-

the supreme court of a state, whether or not the phraseology of the instrument in controversy was expressive of a contract and within the protection of the Constitution of the United States, and that its obligation should be enforced notwithstanding a contrary conclusion by the supreme court of a state? It was never intended, and cannot be sustained by any course of reasoning, that this court should or could, with fidelity to the Constitution of the United States, follow the construction of the supreme court of a state in such a matter when it entertained a different opinion; and in forming its judgment in such a case it makes no difference in the obligation of this court in reversing the judgment of the supreme court of a state upon such a contract, whether it be one claimed to be such under the form of state legislation, or has been made by a covenant or agreement by the agents of a state by its authority. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436, 17 L. ed. 173.

Later Miller, J., dealt with the same point, thus: It is said, however, that it is not the validity of the act of 1860 which is complained of by plaintiffs, but the construction placed upon that act by the state court. If this construction is one which violates the plaintiffs' contract, and is the one on which the defendants are acting, it is clear that the plaintiffs have no relief except in this court, and that this court will not be discharging its duty to see that no state legislature shall pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract unless it takes jurisdiction of such cases. Proprietors of Bridges v. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. 1 Wall. 116, 17 L. ed. 571.

This court has always jealously asserted the right, declared the same judge again, when the question before it was the impairing of the obligation of a contract by state legislation, to ascertain for itself whether there was a contract to be impaired. If it were not so, the constitutional provision could always be evaded by the state courts giving such construction to the contract, or such decisions concerning its validity, as to render the power of this court of no avail in upholding it against unconstitutional state legislation. Delmas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 14 Wall. 661, 20 L. ed. 757.

The rule was recognized, and an elaborate explanation made as to why it did not operate in that particular case, in Kennebec & P. R. Co. v. Portland & K. R. Co. 14 Wall. 25, 20 L. ed. 851.

Justice Miller once more calls attention to this principle by saying: Whether that contract is such as to be impaired by these later laws is one of the questions of which this court tinuing to exist. It merged its existence in the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company,—was devoured by it,—and in surrendering its existence and organization and name, and all it had, to the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, it surrendered all that pertained to it.

If a new company was formed, exemption was gone; and, if the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company was enlarged and extended by the absorption of the other, the charter of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company became the law of the being of the organization, for so it is declared. The charter was drawn for a purpose, and the provision that consolidation was not to give exemption from taxes was intended to capture the legislature, and doubtless had that effect. Being the work of the promoters, it must be taken most strongly against the corporation.

always has jurisdiction. Northwestern University v. Illinois ex rel. Miller, 99 U. S. 309, 25 L. ed. 287.

Still later, Matthews, J., thus expressed it: The question we have to consider and decide is whether, in the judgment under review, the supreme court of Florida gave effect to a law of the state, which, in violation of the Constitution of the United States, impairs the obligation of a contract. In reaching a conclusion on that point, we decide for ourselves, independently of the decision of the state court, whether there is a contract, and whether its obligation is impaired; and, if the decision of the question as to the existence of the alleged contract requires a construction of the state Constitution and laws, we are not necessarily governed by the previous decisions of the state courts upon the same or similar points, except where they have been so firmly established as to constitute a rule of property. Such has been the uniform and well-settled doctrine of this court. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 27 L. ed. 922, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198.

And Harlan, J., thus states the rule: Whether an alleged contract arises from state legislation, or by agreement with the agents of a state, by its authority, or by stipulations between individuals exclusively, we are obliged, upon our own judgment, and independently of the adjudication of the state court, to decide whether there exists a contract within the protection of the Constitution of the United States. Louisville Gas. Co. v. Citizens' Gaslight Co. 115 U. S. 683, 29 L. ed. 510, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 265.

Gray, J., refers to it in this wise: In determining whether the statute of a state impairs the obligation of a contract, this court, doubtless, must decide for itself the existence and effect of the original contract, although in the form of a statute, as well as whether its obligation has been impaired. Vicksburg, S. & P. R. Co. v. Dennis, 116 U. S. 665, 29 L. ed. 770, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

The rule was recognized and approved, but held not to apply, in New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Ref. Co. 125 U. S. 18, 31 L. ed. 607, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 741.

In a case involving the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, anent the question whether, by a judgment sued upon in a state where it was not rendered, the nature of the cause of action had changed, the court said: 'The case in this regard is analogous to one

The attempt of the consolidating companies to avoid the effect of consolidation by their agreement can have no effect. They had the right to agree on terms, but could not vary the legal consequence of what they did, by any declaration or agreement. The law determines that.

The power to consolidate is a corporate franchise, and where it was not exercised so as to effect organization before the adoption of the Constitution, its subsequent exercise was subject to the provision for the taxation of all the property of private corporations for pecuniary gain, in view of which there cannot be an exemption of the property of such corporation, except when like exemption is extended to individuals.

arising under the clause of the Constitution which forbids a state to pass any law impairing the obligations of contracts, in which if the state court gives effect to a subsequent law which is impugned as impairing the obligations of a contract, this court has power, in order to determine whether any contract has been impaired, to decide for itself what the true construction of the contract is. Huntington v. Attrill, 146 U. S. 657, 36 L. ed. 1123, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224.

The principle is now accepted as of course. "So that it is necessary to inquire as to the existence and effect of the alleged contract. And that question must be determined by this court upon its own judgment, independently of any adjudication by the state court." Bryan v. Kentucky Annual Conference M. E. Church, South, Bd. of Edu. 151 U. S. 639, 38 L. ed. 297, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 465.

It is well settled that the decision of a state court holding that, as a matter of construction, a particular charter or charter provision does not constitute a contract, is not binding upon this court. The question of the existence or nonexistence of a contract in cases like the present is one which this court will determine for itself. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968.

In reversing State ex rel. Marr v. Stearns, 72 Minn. 200, 75 N. W. 210, the Supreme Court of the United States again declared that the general rule of that court was to adopt as conclusive the construction of a state constitution made by the highest court of the state, but to this rule there was one exception which had been constantly recognized, and that was, when a question of contract arises the competency of a state, through legislation, to make the alleged contract, and the meaning and validity of such contract, are matters which the United States Supreme Court, in discharging its duties under the Federal Constitution, must determine for itself; and, while in doing so it would lean to the interpretation of the state court, such leaning cannot relieve it from the duty of independently answering the question of contract or no contract. Stearns v. Minnesota ex rel. Marr, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. ed. 162, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73.

And in dismissing one of the writs of error sued out by the railroad company in the principal case, the court once more declared that there is no doubt of the general proposition that where a contract is alleged to have been impaired by subsequent legislation it would put its own construction upon the contract, though

The Constitution preserved the status quo of existing exemptions, but does not apply to exemption in a new organization effected by the exercise of a corporate franchise, after the adoption of the Constitution.

The case of Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33, so far from being an adjudication of any question here involved, can have no influence on this case. The case did not present any of the questions here presented. There was a careful avoidance of any expression of opinion, even, as to the effect of the consolidation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, as to anything except the matter before the court.

Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

The parties are not the same or in privacy. The state was not a party to the former litigation, and the fact that the attorney general appeared in this court for the sheriff did not make the state a party or bound by the result. But the conclusion of a state court that a general state statute which declared that certain property therein mentioned, not inclusive of any railroad property, and none other, should be alone exempt from taxation, operated to repeal a special railroad act granting such an exemption, notwithstanding a further provision in such general statute declaring private and local laws not revised and brought into it not affected by its enactment unless expressly so therein provided, is conclusive upon the United States Supreme Court when the exemption contended for does not amount to an irrepealable contract, and hence is not protected by the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 46, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

IV. Legislative and governmental powers.

The courts are ever reluctant to declare a statute unconstitutional. Whether the act be one granting an exemption from taxation, or taking it away, the courts equally incline to sustain the law.

In the early case of Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648, Chase, J., expressed himself thus vigorously upon this point: I am under a necessity to give a construction or explanation of the words "ex post facto laws," because they have not any certain meaning attached to them. But I will not go farther than I feel myself bound to go; and if I ever exercise the jurisdiction I will not decide any law to be void but in a very clear case.

The question, said the United States Supreme Court, soon afterward, in a case arising under the constitutional provision forming the subject of this note, whether a law be void for repugnancy to the Constitution, is at all times a question of much delicacy, which ought seldom, if ever, to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station could it be unmindful of the solemn obligation which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers, and its acts to be considered void. The opposition between the Constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162.

And Chief Justice Marshall in the greatest of all cases in point, said, upon this subject: On more than one occasion this court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of such questions; and has declared that in no doubtful case would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the Constitution. Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518, 4 L. ed. 629.

It is only when a law transcends the legislative power that the courts can interfere. People ex rel. Panama R. Co. v. New York Tax Comrs., 104 N. Y. 240, 10 N. E. 437.

To declare an act of a co-ordinate department of the government an unwarrantable assumption or usurpation of power because it is a violation of a constitutional prohibition is an exercise of the judicial office of a grave and delicate nature, and which never can be warranted but in a clear case. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 12 Gill & J. 399, 38 Am. Dec. 317.

When the validity of a particular power exercised by the legislature is contested, it is not necessary to show that the power was granted by the Constitution. Those who dispute the power must establish affirmatively and clearly that it has been denied. It is presumed to exist. The legislature is the depository of the power of the people, and its authority cannot be curtailed without diminishing the power of the people. It is upon this ground, as well as from a becoming respect for the action of a co-ordinate department of the government, that the courts have uniformly declared that in no doubtful case would they pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the Constitution. Martin, J., in the court below, whose decision is affirmed in Baltimore v. State ex rel. Board of Police, 15 Md. 370, 74 Am. Dec. 572.

The New York court of appeals in one case pauses to call attention to "certain principles which, though not controverted," it thought had "sometimes been overlooked in the argument" of the case then at bar. The people of that state, it said, in framing their Constitution committed to the legislature the whole law-making power of the state which they did not expressly or impliedly withhold. Plenary power in the legislature for all purposes of civil government is the rule. A prohibition to exercise a particular power is the exception. In inquiring, therefore, whether a given statute is constitutional, it is for those who question its validity to show that it is forbidden. People ex rel. Wood v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 543.

To constitute res judicata, the matter involved in the second suit must have been decided in the first; and this must not be left to inference, or be matter of argument.

Herman, Estoppel, 279; Freeman, Judgm. §§ 256-462.

It is a well-established principle of judicial construction that before an act of the legislature ought to be declared unconstitutional its repugnancy to the provisions or necessary implications of the Constitution should be manifest and free from all reasonable doubt. If its character in this regard be questionable, then comity and a proper respect for a co-ordinate branch of the government should determine the matter in favor of the action of the latter. This doctrine has been uniformly held. Baltimore v. State ex rel. Board of Police, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572.

In the decision below, which the case just cited affirmed, Martin, J., had said on this point: In reference, therefore, to the question whether this act is to be treated as unconstitutional, I assume that the legislature is to be considered in the possession of all powers properly legislative, so far as the Constitution of the state of Maryland is concerned, which have not been by that Constitution prohibited expressly or by necessary implication. Ibid.

Obviously these principles apply with equal cogency to statutory contracts exempting persons and property from taxation as to laws imposing taxes.

In the Ohio bank tax cases, which were regularly reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States as fast as they came before it for review, the state courts denied, and the Federal Court affirmed, the legislative power, in the absence of restrictive provisions of the Ohio Constitution, to make beyond recall a partial surrender of the power of taxation by statute law. The cases are commented upon below.

In the cases of Home of the Friendless v. Rouse, 8 Wall. 430, 19 L. ed. 495, and Washington University v. Rouse, 8 Wall. 439, 19 L. ed. 498, where the validity of a perpetual exemption was upheld as an irrevocable contract by a majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, three of the judges, Chase, Ch. J., Miller and Field, JJ., dissented upon the broad ground that no legislative body sitting under a state Constitution of the usual character has a right to sell, give, or bargain away forever the taxing power of the state,—a power absolutely necessary to the continued existence of every modern political society.

This view, while meeting here and there with approval of courts and judges in isolated cases, has not prevailed, and the current of authorities has run in the contrary direction.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in one case, denied the power of the legislature of that state to barter away the sovereign right 60 L. R. A.

The consolidation effected between the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company and the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railway Company on the 24th day of October, 1892, was not a waiver of the privilege conferred by § 5 of the act of March 3, 1882, incorporating § 21 of the charter of the Mobile & Northwestern Railroad Company.

Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33.

The fact that two suits are for different taxes does not prevent the operation of the doctrine of res judicata.

of taxation, and asserted that any piece of legislation which did so would be unconstitutional and void. That case was a suit in equity for an injunction to prevent the carrying into effect of a statute providing for the public sale of the main line of public improvements belonging to the state, and closing with a provision upon which the attack upon its constitutionality was based, that if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company became the purchaser, it should pay in addition to the purchase price at which the property was knocked down, $1,500,000, in consideration whereof such railroad and the Harrisburg Railroad Company should be discharged by the commonwealth forever from payment of all tonnage taxes, and all other taxes whatever except local ones. The decision was rendered in 1858, and opinions were written by Lewis, Ch. J., Lowrie and Knox, JJ., and a memorandum of concurrence in the opinion of the chief justice by Woodward, J. The learned chief justice plainly considers state Constitutions as grants of power from the people to the legislatures, and not limitations upon powers inherent. He regards a legislature as possessed of no powers not expressly or by necessary inference conferred upon it by the people. He says of Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 142, 11 L. ed. 533, that the attorney general of Maryland admitted therein that there was a contract, and that it was protected, so that "the question of the constitutional power of the legislature to contract away the taxing power was therefore neither raised nor decided." If the question had been decided in the Gordon Tax Case it would have related "to powers conferred" by the Maryland Constitution, and not "to those granted" by that of Pennsylvania. And, in referring to Hardy v. Waltham, 7 Pick. 110, he says that it was a case of the people confirming in their Constitution an exemption of a college in an old colonial ordinance, and that the power of the people has never been doubted. All power emanates from the people. "But it is denied that they have in this state granted any such power to the legislature." Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 664.

Mr. Justice Miller, of the United States Supreme Court, was of this opinion. "The writer of this opinion," he says in one case, "has always believed, and believes now, that one legislature of a state has no power to bargain away the right of any succeeding legislature to levy taxes in as full a manner as the Constitution will permit. But so long as the majority of this court adhere to the contrary doctrine, he must, when the question arises, join with the other judges in considering whether such a contract has been made." New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352.

If the question were an open one, afterwards said Dixon, J., of New Jersey, I should have no hesitation in reaching the conclusion that the power of taxation could not be made the subject of contract by the legislature; that it was intrusted to the legislature to be exercised, not to be destroyed or abridged; that, as it resided in our prototype, the English Parliament, unimpaired by acts of previous sessions of that body, so it was possessed by our legislature unfettered save as fundamental law restrained it; and that the constitutional clause protecting contracts could not, with reason, be extended to what, in all our history, had been regarded, not as a bargain between parties at liberty to assent or dissent, but as an exertion of the sovereign power controlling the willing and unwilling alike. But, unfortunately, as I think, the question is closed by judicial decisions which no court in this state can disturb; and, unless these decisions shall be reversed, it must be conceded that the legislature has power to barter away this essential attribute of government. Little v. Bowers, 46 N. J. L. 300, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

And Freeman, J., writing for the supreme court of Tennessee, declares it to be his personal opinion that, as a general proposition, the power of the state to sell or give away forever, or for a limited period, the untrammelled right of taxation is one not possessed by a legislature unless expressly granted (and he knows of no constitution in which such a grant can be found). Of the dissent in the last-mentioned United States Supreme Court cases, he says that the argument was not only unanswered, but was unanswerable. But he admits that the question is settled by controlling decisions the other way, although the tendency is against extending such cases. State v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 12 Lea, 583.

Whatever may be our opinion, said the same court soon afterward, of the power of the legislature in the granting of a charter of incorporation providing for the exemption from taxation of the property of such corporation so as to tie the hands of succeeding legislatures from imposing an equal share of the burdens of maintaining the government upon such corporation as the exigencies of the state may require, it is now too well settled by repeated decisions that such provisions create a contract, the obligation of which cannot be impaired, for us to attempt to disturb or review them here. State use of Memphis v. Butler, 86 Tenn. 614, 8 S. W. 586.

It is no longer debatable, but affirmatively settled whether a legislature can bind the state by contract with a corporation created by its charter not to tax for a given time the franchise or property of such corporation further than is agreed on in its charter. State v. Bank of Smyrna, 2 Houst. (Del.) 99, 73 Am. Dec. 690.

The proposition that the legislature has no authority to surrender the sovereign power of taxation, and that any attempt to do so is unconstitutional and void, when no constitutional limitation upon the power of the legislature in this particular exists, has been conclusively negated by a line of contrary decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the state courts have no alternative but to submit. State v. Dexter & N. R. Co. 69 Me. 44; State v. Knox & L. R. Co. 78 Me. 92, 2 Atl. 846.

The power of exemption, as well as the power of taxation, is one of the essential elements of sovereignty. Richmond v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 604; Com. v. Richmond & P. R. Co. 81 Va. 855.

Says Staples, J., in the first of these cases: "The right of a legislature to surrender the power of taxation in specific cases has been the subject of one of the ablest and most exhaustive judicial discussions ever known in the Supreme Court of the United States, and is now regarded as established upon the most solid foundations of public policy and expediency."

If not restrained by constitutional provision, the legislature has the power to release a corporation from liability to taxation, however improvident and unwise may be such action. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

A legislature has power, when not restricted by some constitutional provision, to contract with a corporation for its immunity from taxation. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 48 Md. 49; Mobile & S. H. R. Co. v. Kennerly, 74 Ala. 566; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 509.

A state legislature, not restrained by any constitutional provision to the contrary, may, in a given case, alienate or abridge the taxing power by charter to a corporation. And a territorial legislature, whose powers by the organic act of Congress are declared to extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Federal Constitution and the provisions of the organizing act, has like powers, and may lawfully relieve lands granted by the general government in aid of a railroad from taxation in consideration of the annual payment of a percentage tax upon gross earnings in lieu

The charters authorized a consolidation to be made upon such terms as the consolidating companies should agree on; and the articles of consolidation expressly stipulated that the consolidation, when made, should not disturb the corporate existence of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, or form any new and distinct corporation.

Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Howard, thereof. First Div. St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Farcher, 14 Minn. 297, Gil. 224.

The supreme court of Vermont, in 1899, in upholding the validity of an exemption from municipal taxation granted after a popular vote taken by statutory authority, put forth relative to the legislative power of taxation and exemption the following maxims: Unless prohibited by constitutional restrictions, the legislature may confer upon municipalities such power to tax as the state itself possesses. The power to tax includes the power to exempt unless specially denied by the Constitution. The general right to make exemptions is involved in the right to apportion taxes, and exists in the supreme legislative power, unless expressly forbidden. The power of the Vermont legislature in this respect has not only not been abridged by the Constitution, but, on the contrary, throughout the entire legislative history of the state its power to declare what property should be untaxed has been recognized and exercised. Colton v. Montpelier, 71 Vt. 413, 45 Atl. 1039.

And in Michigan it is held that the legislative power, when unhampered by constitutional restrictions, to exempt from taxation or to contract with a railroad corporation for a percentage tax on earnings as commutation for and in lieu of other taxes, may be delegated to a municipality in respect of an urban street railway. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809.

Hunt, J., for the United States Supreme Court, in one case has this to say: Another question is raised. That the legislature possesses no power to grant a corporation perpetual immunity from taxation. It is said that the power of taxation is among the highest powers of a sovereign state, that its exercise is a political necessity, without which the state must cease to exist, and that it is not competent for one legislature, by binding its successors, to compass the death of the state. It is too late to raise this question in this court. It has been held that the legislature has the power to bind the state in relinquishing its power to tax a corporation. It has been held that such a provision in the charter of a corporation constitutes a contract which the state may not subsequently impair. These doctrines have been reiterated and reaffirmed so recently as 1871 by Davis, J., in Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568. They must be considered as settled in this court. Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244, 21 L. ed. 326.

The bare fact that by a consolidation a new company is formed does not cause a lapse, or forfeiture, or waiver of any privilege, even of exemption from taxation, previously enjoyed by one of the consolidating companies.

judged, it would admit of grave consideration whether the legislature of a state can surrender this power and make its action in this respect binding upon its successors, any more than it can surrender its police power or right of eminent domain. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888.

The power of the legislature of a state to exempt particular parcels of property of individuals, or of corporations, not merely during the period of its own existence, but so as to be beyond the control of the taxing power, has been asserted in several cases by the United States Supreme Court, although against this doctrine there have been earnest protests by individual judges. Hoge v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 U. S. 348, 25 L. ed. 303.

A constitution providing that all lands liable to taxation, held by deed, grant, or entry, town lots, bank stock, slaves, and such other property as the legislature may from time to time deem expedient shall be taxable, does not make it the duty of the legislature to tax all property, but leaves it discretionary with that body to tax, or omit to tax,—that is, to exempt,—as it may deem expedient. Such a provision merely requires that when property is taxed it shall be ad valorem, according to uniform rules. Inasmuch, then, as such a constitution does not command all property to be taxed, the state legislature has power to grant exemption from taxation in a charter of incorporation, which, being accepted, becomes a binding and irrevocable contract of which the obligation may not be impaired by subsequent law. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Hicks, 9 Baxt. 442; Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968.

In determining what power the legislature of a state may rightfully exercise, the Constitution is not to be regarded as a grant of power. The legislature has inherently all legislative power, and the Constitution only limits or restricts such power; it does not confer it. As a power to grant corporate charters is a legislative power, and it is settled that such a grant becomes, when accepted, a contract which may not be impaired by subsequent legislation when no right to do so is reserved, stipulations in it for exemptions from, or commuted, taxation are held to be important elements therein, and protected by the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. The authorities, however, upon this point all go upon the assumption that there is no constitutional restraint upon the power of the legislature to grant charters of that character. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Hicks, 9 Baxt. 442.

The harm against which § 180 of the Constitution was directed was this: To subject charters theretofore granted, but not accepted because not organized under, to the new rules of the Constitution, they being as yet mere offers of franchises by the state, and not closed contracts. The provision had no relation to a mere consolidation of two old companies long since organized and in active business under their charters.

The convention did not intend to embrace, as a condition to the exercise of any powers contained in charters already granted and organized under and put into operation, the requirement that the companies should come under any new and different law as made by the Constitution itself.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question which lies at the foundation of this case is this: Conceding, for argument's sake, that the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company had an exemption from taxation, did the consolidation of that railroad with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company on October 24, 1892, create a new corporation, as of that date, and thus result in the cutting off of said exemption, by § 180 of the Constitu-

The power of a legislature to grant exemption from taxation, wholly or partially and for fixed or indefinite periods, necessarily includes the power to exempt upon conditions or contingencies which are to happen in the future, as, for instance, to exempt a railroad from taxes whenever the imposition thereof will reduce its dividends below a stated percentage. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968.

Since the days of the Revolution taxation has been recognized as a representative act. The power to tax necessarily implies a power to exempt. Taxation being a legislative power, it is not the province of a court to review it, except in cases where the power is limited by constitutional restrictions. A provision in the Constitution that all laws should be made for the good of the whole, and the burdens of the state ought to be fairly distributed among its citizens, does not limit the legislative power of taxation and exemption. It is directory, not mandatory. Crafts v. Ray, 22 R. I. 179, 49 L. R. A. 604, 46 Atl. 1043.

The New York legislature, so far as the Constitution of that state stood in 1880, had the power to exempt railroads from taxation. Whether or not the exercise of such a power is wise, it is not for the courts to say. People ex rel. Troy Union R. Co. v. Carter, 52 Hun, 458, 5 N. Y. Supp. 507, Affirmed in 117 N. Y. 625, 22 N. E. 1128.

The legislature of Georgia is competent to contract in the charter of a corporation that its tax shall not exceed a stated rate per cent of its earnings; and, having so contracted without reservation, it is not competent for a subsequent legislature to impair the obligation of such contract by assessing a higher tax. A statute attempting to do so is unconstitutional and void. State v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 54 Ga. 423.

The court in so holding did so rather against its convictions, feeling constrained by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, which it deemed controlling, but unsound.

The power of the legislature to grant a corporate charter, constituting in terms an irrevocable contract for a definite term for the payment by the corporation annually of a stated sum into the public treasury as a full commutation for all taxes, imposts, and assessments on the capital stock or corporate property, is not affected or limited by an article in the state Constitution declaring that no man or set of men is entitled to exclusive separate public emoluments or privileges but in consideration 60 L. R. A.

of public services. Daughdrill v. Alabama Life Ins. & T. Co. 31 Ala. 91.

The power of the legislature to exempt particular classes or kinds from taxation and assessment is well settled. Such power is not affected by a constitutional provision making it the duty and empowering the legislature to provide for the organization of municipalities, and to restrict their power of taxation and assessment, borrowing money, contracting debts, and loaning their credit so as to prevent abuses. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Milwaukee, 95 Wis. 42, 69 N. W. 796.

The territorial legislature of Minnesota had power to exempt from taxation lands granted to aid railroad construction, and, having exercised such power, its grant constituted a contract irrevocable, not only by its successors and the state of Minnesota, but none the less so by the territory of Dakota after the organization thereof as an independent government. Winnona & St. P. R. Co. v. Deuel County, 3 Dak. 1, 12 N. W. 561.

A provision in a state Constitution that mines and mining claims bearing gold, silver, and precious metals (except as to net proceeds and surface improvements) shall be exempt from taxation for ten years after its adoption, and thereafter taxable as provided by law, does not make the subsequent taxation mandatory upon the legislature, but leaves it in the discretion of that body; and the exemption continues until the legislature expressly and positively provides otherwise. People ex rel. Iron Silver Min. Co. v. Henderson, 12 Colo. 369, 21 Pac. 144.

Inasmuch as a legislature has no power, in the face of a constitutional provision prohibiting all exemptions from taxation, to transfer to a new corporation an exemption formerly enjoyed in virtue of an antecedent irrevocable contract by a railroad taken over by the state upon mortgage foreclosure, a grant of all the rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities of the extinct company has no such effect. Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. ed. 938.

The legislature has no power to continue an irrevocable charter contract for tax exemption enjoyed by a constituent railroad to the consolidated company, which it enters by virtue of a consolidating statute passed after a constitutional provision making all corporate charters subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal becomes operative. State v. Northern C. R. Co. 44 Md. 131.

The legislature has no power to grant an irrevocable right to tax immunity by a compromise agreement, when it lacks power to do so by tion of 1890? If this question be answered in the affirmative, then, obviously, the contention of the state must prevail throughout, without regard to any other questions in the case. The power to consolidate must be granted by the state, and permission to consolidate, so granted, is not a contract, but a mere license. 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 802; Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co. 161 U. S. 667, 40 L. ed. 845, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kentucky, 161 U. S. 695, 40 L. ed. 857, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 714; Kcokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 312, 38 L. ed. 455, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. These railroad companies were perfectly free to consolidate or not. The Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, if it had a legal exemption, could have retained it by simply retaining the precise corporate existence it then had.

original action. The power to continue an ir-repealable charter exemption vanishes when the Constitution intervenes to take away the power to confer it by original grant. Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 258, 47 L. ed. — 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, Affirming 90 Md. 449, 45 Atl. 465.

When the legislature has no constitutional power to exempt any property from taxation, a provision in a bank charter exempting it from taxation except upon its real estate is ineffectual. New Orleans v. Louisiana Sav. Bank & S. D. Co. 31 La. Ann. 826.

While it is true that a corporate charter constitutes a contract with the state which grants it, which may not be impaired by subsequent legislation within the purview of the Federal Constitution, the protection afforded to it extends only to property rights thereunder, and not to governmental ones; hence, the exercise of the police power by one legislature cannot be barred away by the contract of an earlier one, and any agreement to withhold such legislative action is a mere license revocable at pleasure of any legislature. But none the less, a constitutional provision making such a contract will bind the legislature from impairing it, where an ordinary piece of legislation would not have that effect. New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 30 L. ed. 411, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198.

When a state Constitution declares that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals; that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state; that all property shall be taxed ad valorem, to be ascertained as directed by law,—a legislature of such state has no power to make an ir-repealable grant of exemption from taxation to any railroad by charter or other law; but corporate property must always remain subject—that is, liable—to taxation, whether or not immediately and always actually thereunto subjected. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hweas, 183 U. S. 66, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

A constitutional mandate that all property shall be taxed prevents the legislature from granting any exemption whatever, no matter what the consideration. It is not the nature or extent of the consideration which is to be looked to, but the legislative power. Existing exemptions cannot, of course, be interfered with; but new exemptions are beyond legislative competency. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 3 Tenn. Ch. 604.

Const. 1890, § 181. Consolidation was voluntary on their part, and effected subject to the law and Constitution then in force. What the effect of consolidation is, depends upon the will and purpose, not of the corporations, but of the state, speaking through the legislature.

Great stress has been laid upon the provisions of § 5, p. 843, Acts 1882, to the effect that the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company might consolidate with other railroad companies "upon such terms as they may agree upon." But this simply meant "such terms as they, the companies, might agree upon," consistent with the law as announced in their charters and otherwise. The charter of the Memphis & Vicksburg Railroad Company, one of the constituents of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, expressly stipulates that

The case itself, after affirmance by the supreme court of Tennessee, was finally affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091.

The declaration in the Kentucky Bill of Rights, that no man or set of men is entitled to exclusive separate public emoluments or privileges from the community but in consideration of public services, is held by the courts of that state to deprive the legislature of power to grant exemptions from taxation save in return for services rendered or to be rendered to the public. And, as it is further held that city waterworks, even when owned by municipalities in their corporate right, do not render public services, but are held for profit and convenience rather than for governmental ends, acts granting them exemptions from taxation, whether charters or not, are unconstitutional to that extent. Com. v. Makibben, 90 Ky. 384, 14 S. W. 372; Covington v. Com. 19 Ky. L. Rep. 105, 39 S. W. 836; Clark v. Louisville Water Co. 90 Ky. 515, 14 S. W. 502.

The last case was affirmed in the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the right to withdraw the exemption had been reserved by antecedent statute reserving generally a right to alter, amend, and repeal all corporate charters. Louisville Water Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 55, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346.

The Indiana constitutional provision (art. 10, § 1, Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, § 193, and Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 193) that the general assembly shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property, both real and personal, excepting such only for municipal, educational, literary, scientific, religious, or charitable purposes as may be specially exempted by law, is construed by the courts of that state as taking away the power of the legislature to grant any property exemptions outside of the specified classes. State ex rel. Tieman v. Indianapolis, 60 Ind. 375, 35 Am. Rep. 223; Warner v. Curran, 75 Ind. 300; Deniston v. Terry, 141 Ind. 677, 41 N. E. 143; Harn v. Woodward, 151 Ind. 132, 50 N. E. 33; *State ex rel. any consolidation shall be "on such terms as may be consistent with the powers conferred on said company." Substantially identical language with the language of § 5, supra, occurred in the charters under consideration in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S., at page 309, 38 L. ed. at page 454 and 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 595, and Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S., at page 361, 25 L. ed., at page 186, and in many other cases. These words, "upon such terms as they may agree upon," are not new. They perhaps appear substantially in all grants of power to consolidate railroad or other corporations,—as, for example, in Atlanta & R. Air-Line R. Co. v. State, 63 Ga., at page 486. They have no magic in them. They are plain, everyday phrases, and relate alone to the mere administrative details attending the consolidation of corporations, which must, of course, be left to the officers of such corporations, and with which the legislature cannot be burdened, and they convey no substantive powers or rights. These must be found, if anywhere, expressly set forth by the legislature in the charters in the first instance, and not delegated to the corporations, to be worked out under the gloss of these mere administrative phrases. Whether, therefore, the union of these two corporations resulted, in consolidation and the creation of a new corporation, or in mere merger of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad, is to be found, not in this phrase so much relied on, but in the clear purpose of the legislature. The articles of consolidation are to be carefully looked to, of course; but they must conform in what they do, if valid, to the purpose of foreign investments for the purpose of constructing the road. Nashville & K. R. Co. v. Wilson County, 89 Tenn. 597, 15 S. W. 446.

A municipality has no power to contract by ordinance irrevocably with a street railway company in limitation of its obligations respecting street improvements so as to deplete the state legislature of its right to increase the corporate burdens, when, at the time such company was organized, there was in force a state statute expressly subjecting to legislative control, regulation, alteration, abridgment, and cancellation all corporate charters, by-laws, rules, and regulations, and making every corporate franchise open to withdrawal, regulation, and conditional enjoyment at the legislative will. Sioux City Street R. Co. v. Sioux City, 135 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 808, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 228. Affirming 78 Iowa, 367, 43 N. W. 224.

When a state Constitution requires that all property, whether owned by natural persons or corporations, shall be taxed ad valorem unless exempted by the organic law; that all corporate property shall pay the same rate of taxation paid by individual property; and provides that the legislature may, besides, impose taxes on incomes, licenses, and franchises; when, too, it authorizes the legislature to delegate the like power as to franchisees to municipalities, and the legislature has enacted a statute requiring every street railway company, in addition to other taxes laid upon it, to pay annually on its franchise both a state tax and a local tax to the county, city, town, or taxing district wherein such franchise may be exercised and according to the value thereof; and when, beyond all that, the charter of a municipal corporation forbids its board of trustees to grant any special privilege to any person, corporation, or company, or to exempt any such person or body from the payment of taxes,—such municipality has no power to exempt a street railway operating within its limits from payment of taxes upon its franchise ad valorem, either by contractual ordinance upon good consideration, or otherwise. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1184, 57 L. R. A. 50, 49 S. W. 23.

V. Constitutional changes.

It is not at all times easy in a given case to decide just what is the effect of an amended state Constitution upon exemptions from taxation operative at the time of its adoption. In general it may be said that exemptions enjoyed by virtue of irrevocable contracts are not affected thereby, for a constitutional provision, equally with a statutory enactment, is a law 60 L. R. A.

within the meaning of the contract clause of the Constitution of the Union, which states are forbidden to pass if thereby the obligation of a contract is impaired; that repealable contracts of exemption become immediately subject to the provisions of the new organic law; and that continued, extended, or transferred grants of exemption can only be made subject to the conditions and limitations imposed by the new Constitution.

A constitutional limitation upon the legislative power to exempt from taxation does not prevent the continuing of an immunity contracted for in a corporate charter antedating the adoption of the Constitution so restricting. St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 469.

A constitutional declaration that the legislature shall never in any manner suspend or surrender the power of taxation does not affect a contract to the contrary in a corporate charter antecedently granted. State v. Dexter & N. R. Co. 69 Me. 44.

There is a radical difference between a constitutional provision that all lands liable to taxation held by deed, grant, or entry, town lots, bank stock, and such other property as the legislature may from time to time deem expedient, shall be taxable; that all property shall be taxed ad valorem, the value to be ascertained as the legislature shall direct, so that it shall be equal and uniform throughout the state; and that no one species of property from which a tax may be collected shall be taxed higher than another of equal value (Tenn. Const. 1834, art. 2, § 28),—and another providing that all property, real, personal, and mixed, shall be taxed, but that the legislature may exempt certain enumerated kinds, and then, that all property shall be taxed ad valorem, etc., etc., as in the other provision (Tenn. Const. 1870, art. 2, § 28). Under the former, the legislature may tax, or omit to tax, as it chooses; under the latter it has no power to exempt outside of the excepted classes. Memphis v. Memphis City Bank, 91 Tenn. 574, 19 S. W. 1045.

Stock issued from time to time by a banking corporation to increase its capital from $200,000, upon which it was authorized to organize and elect directors, to $1,000,000, by virtue of a charter provision that it might receive on deposit any and all sums not below a minimum weekly amount, and when such deposits reached a stated sum they might, at the option of the depositor, be converted into stock, is all, as respects taxation, upon the same footing as the initial issue. It participates in the rights and benefits of the contract in the charter in that regard, and is unaffected by a new state Consti-the legislature as to what the effect of the consolidation shall be. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 305, 38 L. ed. 453, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia, 92 U. S. 605, 23 L. ed. 757.

Let us inquire, then, what the effect of this consolidation was. And, first, what railroads entered into this consolidation? The Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company and the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. What was the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company? It is described in the "articles of consolidation" as "the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, a corporation of the states of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana, of the first part;" and it is further expressly declared in said articles that the consolidation is effected "under and by virtue of the charters of the respective states of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana in such case made and provided," etc. The two ends of this railroad are in Louisiana and Tennessee. Now, what were the laws touching consolidation in these states, "in such case made and provided?" Of course, we deal here exclusively with the Mississippi corporation under our laws; but the laws of Louisiana and Tennessee are expressly referred to as having been held in mind in effecting this consolidation, and they will materially aid us in solving this question. The road, with all its property, was a unit in the three states. If the effect of the consolidation in Tennessee and Louisiana was known necessarily to be the creation of a new corporation, it hardly comports with reason to suppose that any different consolidation would have been sought at the hands of the Mississippi legislature, or tution adopted in the meantime. State v. Bank of Commerce, 95 Tenn. 221, 31 S. W. 993.

The Tennessee legislature had power, under the Constitution of 1834 (art. 2, § 28; art. 11, § 7), to grant exemptions from both ad valorem property and privilege taxes. When in a given case it had exercised that power, its action was conclusive on the state, even after a change and reversal of governmental policy by a new constitution. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

In New Jersey, domestic fire insurance companies having capital stock and taxable upon the amount thereof paid in and their accumulated surplus less the value of their real estate, and entitled, in estimating the value thereof, to the deduction of their investments in exempt property, are entitled to have included in such deductions school bonds issued by authority of a state law and made thereby exempt from taxation, although after the issue and negotiation thereof a constitutional amendment forbidding such exemptions was adopted. But they are not entitled to the like deduction of township bonds also made exempt by statute, which were not issued until after such constitutional amendment took effect, because that amendment ex proprio vigore abrogated and annulled all local and special laws exempting property from taxation, unless they constituted irrepealable contracts, which was, of course, the case with securities anteriorly negotiated. Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Newark, 54 N. J. L. 138, 23 Atl. 305.

The proposition that an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting exemptions from taxation operates ipso facto to abrogate every special or local law providing for such exemptions which does not amount to an irrepealable contract was affirmed in State, Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Clark, 53 N. J. L. 332, 21 Atl. 302, and in substance, also, in Newport v. Masonic Temple Asso. 103 Ky. 592, 15 S. W. 581, Rehearing denied in 103 Ky. 599, 46 S. W. 697.

A provision in a railroad charter exempting the main and branch lines of the company generally from taxation does not relieve from taxation a new branch road built pursuant to a special enabling act silent on the subject of taxation, passed after an amended Constitution had deprived the legislature of the power it possessed when the original charter was granted to exempt such property. State ex rel. Guffey v. Chicago, R. & K. C. R. Co. 89 Mo. 523, 14 S. W. 522. Affirmed in 120 U. S. 569, 30 L. ed. 732, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, Rehearing denied 122 U. S. 100, 30 L. R. A.

When the charter of an eleemosynary or educational institution declares that all the property of the corporation shall be exempt from taxation, and that relevant sections of the general corporation law of the state shall not apply (one of these being that every corporate charter should be subject to alteration, suspension, or repeal), the corporate real estate is exempt from state taxation, notwithstanding the adoption of a new Constitution prohibiting the legislature from contracting to exempt property from taxation; since, to permit such taxation would impair the obligation of the contract contained in the act of incorporation. Home of the Friendless v. Rouse, 8 Wall. 430, 19 L. ed. 495; Washington University v. Rouse, 8 Wall. 439, 19 L. ed. 498.

The dissenting judges in these cases (Miller, J., Chase, Ch. J., and Field, J.) admitted that the settled doctrine of the court was that it would decide, when the questions were properly brought before it, whether a state law impaired the obligation of a contract, and that, if it did, that it was void; also, that state legislatures could, by statute, make contracts which could not subsequently be impaired by other statutes. They conceded, too, that such contracts were so far protected by the provisions of the Federal Constitution that even a change in the fundamental law of the state by the adoption of a new Constitution cannot impair them, though express provisions to that effect are incorporated in the new Constitution. But they insisted that when a state law was challenged on the ground that it impaired a contract contained in a former law, the power to make such contract was always open to question, and that the decisions relied on to sustain the proposition that an exemption from taxation was a contract not to be impaired invariably assumed the power of the legislature to grant the exemption in the first place. And they asserted that the power to exempt forever, to grant perpetual immunity from taxation, to contract away without limit the whole taxing power, did not, and never could, exist in a constitutional legislature.

If a state Constitution be so amended as to prohibit all tax exemptions, an exemption antecedently granted to a railroad corporation by an irrepealable contract is irretrievably lost when the railroad properties are taken on mortgage foreclosure by the state and conveyed to a new corporation. Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. ed. 338.

This is so although the authorizing statute, and conveyance in pursuance thereof, are granted by it if sought. And so we shall find it to be. Act No. 157 of 1874 of Louisiana, set forth in New Orleans Charity Hospital v. New Orleans Gaslight Co. 40 La. Ann. 385, 4 So. 433 (a general law), expressly provides that "any two business . . . companies . . . may consolidate said corporations, . . . and form one consolidated company, holding," etc., "all property," etc., "belonging to each, and under such corporate name as they may . . . agree upon; . . . and a certificate of the fact of such consolidation, with the name of the consolidated company, shall be filed and recorded in the office of the secretary of state." This is like the Ohio and Missouri statutes referred to in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 308-310, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; and they were all held to provide for a consolidacouched in language sufficiently comprehensive and unequivocal to carry over to the successor corporation the tax immunity as theretofore enjoyed. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 27 L. ed. 922, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193.

After such amendment of the state Constitution, no new corporation is capable of receiving and enjoying old exemptions of this character. Bloxham v. Florida C. & P. R. Co. 35 Fla. 625, 17 So. 902.

A constitutional prohibition against tax exemptions affects, not only corporations created by original charters after it takes effect, but those which, after its adoption, grow out of earlier ones by consolidation. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. Affirming 90 Mo. 30, 6 L. R. A. 222, 12 S. W. 390; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Scotland County Ct. 152 U. S. 317, 38 L. ed. 457, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608; Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 66, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

This is equally true where the new Constitution vests in the legislature power to change or revoke all corporate charters. The irrepealable character of an exemption ceases upon consolidation. State v. Northern C. R. Co. 44 Md. 131; Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 258, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, Affirming 90 Md. 440, 45 Atl. 465.

However, a slight amendment to a railroad charter accepted by the company, not professing to repeal or change an exemption from taxation therein, containing no allusion to the subject of taxation, and not relating to it, does not operate as a new incorporation so as to bring the charter within the terms of a subsequently adopted Constitution making all corporate charters thereafter granted subject to alteration or repeal at the will of the legislature. Richmond & D. R. Co. N. C. Div. v. Brogden, 74 N. C. 707.

A bank not organized until after the adoption of a new constitution which changed matters in that respect, although organized under a new free banking act in substance the same as one in force before the new constitution was adopted, is not entitled to tax exemptions enjoyed by banks organized under the old law and former constitution. State v. Southern Bank, 31 La. Ann. 519.

And when a corporate charter containing a clause that in consideration of certain property vesting in the state after a limited period its stock shall be exempt from taxation by the state or any political subdivision thereof is extended for twenty-five years longer by special statute, but in the meantime there is adopted a new state 60 L. R. A.

tion resulting in a new corporation. New Orleans Charity Hospital v. New Orleans Gaslight Co. 40 La. Ann. 384, 4 So. 433. The provisions of the Tennessee Code (Milliken & V.) of 1884 (§§ 1263-1270) are stronger and more explicit still in necessitating the creation of a new corporation; § 1270 expressly declaring that no exemption from taxation of any constituent company should pass to the consolidated company. The Tennessee and Louisiana ends of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad are integral parts now of the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad. As to these ends, under Louisiana and Tennessee law, the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad is undoubtedly a new corporation. How, then, can this corporation (the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley, an entire corporation) be one new corporation, with Constitution providing for equal and uniform taxation, the extension act is unconstitutional so far as it continues the exemption, for want of legislative power to exempt in any wise. New Orleans v. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. 32 La. Ann. 104.

VI. Incorporation and exemption acts.

a. Grants constituting contracts.

1. Generally.

The doctrine that the charter of a private corporation is, as between the state and the corporation, a contract, has become an established principle of American law. Uniformity and universality have been imparted to the rule by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States so that nothing in the whole range of law is better settled. Goldsmith v. Rome R. Co. 62 Ga. 473.

It is conceded as settled law that an exemption from taxation granted in the charter of a railroad company constitutes a contract which is protected by the Federal Constitution, and cannot be repealed by the state when the right to do so has not been reserved, or does not exist. Com. v. Richmond & P. R. Co. 81 Va. 355.

An exemption from taxation given in a railroad charter when the state Constitution neither restrains the power of the legislature to confer such an exemption, nor reserves to that body the right to alter, amend, or repeal corporate charters, and when such right is not otherwise reserved, is irrevocable. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 48 Md. 49.

A total or partial exemption from taxation, given to a railroad corporation in the incorporating act in unambiguous terms, when there is not anywhere therein, nor by either a constitutional provision or a statute apart therefrom, any reservation of power to alter, amend, or repeal, constitutes an irrevocable contract which is protected from impairment by subsequent laws by constitutional sanctions. Mobile & S. I. R. Co. v. Kennerly, 74 Ala. 566.

It may be conceded that it were better for the interest of the state that the taxing power, which is one of the highest and most important attributes of sovereignty, should on no occasion be surrendered, says Davis, J., in one case in behalf of the United States Supreme Court. In the nature of things, the necessities of the government cannot always be foreseen, and in the changes of time the ability to raise revenue from every species of property may be of vital importance to the state; but the courts of the stock of but one corporation (the new one), in Louisiana and Tennessee, and in Mississippi not one new corporation, and having double stock of both constituent roads? As counsel very pertinently asks, "Which is Tennessee stock, which is Louisiana stock, and which is Mississippi stock?"

What, now, are the provisions of the Mississippi law, as to this consolidation? The Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas had itself no power to consolidate, and it is conceded that this consolidation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley did not take place under § 1 of the act of 1882,—the charter of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas,—but that the power of consolidation authorized by that section was exhausted in the consolidation of the Baton Rouge Railroad with the Memphis & Vicksburg Railroad, forming the country are not the proper tribunals to apply the corrective to improvident legislation of this character. If there be no constitutional restraint on the action of the legislature on this subject, there is no remedy except through the influence of a wise public sentiment reaching and controlling the law-making power. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad. The provisions of law we look to, then, as authorizing the consolidation under consideration are § 16 of the Acts of 1870, p. 326 (the charter of the Memphis & Vicksburg Railroad Company), § 25 of the Acts of 1882, p. 932 (the charter of the New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Vicksburg, & Memphis Railroad Company, the Baton Rouge charter), and § 5 of the Acts of 1882, pp. 842, 843 (the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad charter). The language of said § 16 is as follows: "That said company shall have the right and power to consolidate the stock, property, and franchises of the road with any other road or roads, in or out of this state, at any time that the president and directors of the road may deem proper, and upon such terms as may be consistent with the powers conferred upon said company."

Frequently, however, it is no small task to apply these principles to concrete cases. In the early case of Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 939, it was held that a mere grant of a charter without a bonus or promise of exemption did not prevent the subsequent taxing of the franchise. But when, not long afterward, Maryland assumed to tax the franchise of a corporation she had created, the protection of the contract clause was successfully invoked to defeat her.

The Maryland statute extended the charters of several banks on condition that they respectively should subscribe in proportion to the paid-in capital of each, for as much stock in a corporation organized to build a state road as should be necessary to complete the highway. It pledged the faith of the state, in case such banks accepted and complied with such condition, not to impose any tax or burden upon them during the continuance of their several charters beyond an annual tax upon their capital specifically mentioned in the act. The United States Supreme Court held that this constituted a contract between Maryland and the banks that accepted and complied with the named condition, protected from impairment by the Constitution of the Union, and, therefore, that a subsequent statute directing all stocks and shares in any domestic bank to be assessed and taxed at a stated rate per cent on every $100 of assessable property was void. Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529.

The decision was not acceptable to Maryland. Dorsey, J., of the court of appeals of that state, afterwards commenting upon it, said: "As grounds for its opinion the United States Supreme Court said that when a banking franchise was bought the price was paid for the use of the privilege while it lasted, and any tax upon it would be substantially an addition to the price. And, again, that the franchise is corporate property which, like any other property would be taxable if a price had not been paid for it which the legislature accepted as the consideration for allowing the banks to use the franchise during the continuance of the charters. If, Judge Dorsey, proceeds to say, the Supreme Court meant by any tax a special legislative charge or imposition upon the franchise, the correctness of the principle cannot be denied, and if it meant a special tax, technically speaking, levied for the support of the government of Maryland, it would be clearly unconstitutional and void as repugnant to art. 13, Declaration of Rights, that every person in the state ought to contribute his proportion of the public taxes, etc. But if, as must be done, the Supreme Court be understood as speaking in reference to the general tax laid upon all property within the state under the act of 1841, then, it is respectfully insisted that the proposition cannot be maintained, and that a franchise, as property, is, according to its value, liable to taxation for the support of the government, whether paid for by a bonus or not. Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531.

A section in a North Carolina bank charter, providing that the president or cashier should annually pay into the state treasury a stated sum on each share of the capital stock subscribed for and paid in, the first payment to be made one year after the bank began operations, was held to constitute a contract with the state which fixed a price to be paid by the bank for its franchise. And, as a subsequent general taxing act requiring all banks annually to pay into the state treasury a percentage tax on the stock owned by their stockholders therein, provided the same did not reduce the annual profits of the owners thereof below 6 per cent, was considered to impose a franchise tax upon the bank, rather than a tax upon the several stockholders, collected through the bank, it was adjudged void for impairing the obligation of such contract. Atty. Gen. v. Bank of Charlotte, 57 N. C. (4 Jones Eq.) 287.

It is not necessary, said the court in the above case, that it be declared in such a charter in express terms that no further or other tax shall thereafter be imposed upon the franchise. The state is bounden, and cannot constitutionally impose another or additional tax upon such franchise unless it has explicitly and distinctly reserved the right so to do.

A contract of exemption from taxation arose between the state of New Jersey and the society for establishing useful manufactures by the section of its charter of incorporation providing that all its lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods, and chattels should be free from all taxes, charges, and impositions whatsoever, whether for state, county, or other uses, save that after ten years its real estate might be lawfully taxed for state purposes. By that contract, the state alone could, after a decade,

We understand the well-settled rule of law, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, to be that a consolidation of stock results uniformly and necessarily in the creation of a new corporation. Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, sub nom. Ferguson v. Meredith, 17 L. ed. 604; Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 361, 363, 364, 25 L. ed. 186, 187; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 466, 473, 28 L. ed. 1055, 1057, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, note p. 538. In 98 U. S., supra, at pages 363, 364, 25 L. ed. at page 187, the court says: "That generally the effect of consolidation, as distinguished from a union by merger of one company into another, is to work a dissolution of the companies consolidating, and to create a new corporation out of the elements of the former, is asserted in many cases, and it seems to be a necessary result. In McMahan v. Morrison, 16 Ind. 172, 79 Am. Dec. 418, the effect of a consolidation was said to be a 'dissolution of the corporations previously existing, and at the same instant the creation of a new corporation, with property, liabilities, and stockholders derived from those then passing out of existence.' So, in Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685, the court said: 'Consolidation is a surrender of the old charter by the companies, the acceptance thereof by the legislature, and the formation of a new company out of such portions of the old as enter into the new.' This court, in Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 40, sub nom. Ferguson v. Meredith, 17 L. ed. 608, expressed its approval of what was said in the former of these cases. It is tax the corporate real estate for state uses, and the corporation upon all its properties, and its stockholders upon all their shares, were immune from all other taxes, both state and local. State v. Flavell, 24 N. J. L. 370; State, Colt, Prosecutor, v. Powers, 24 N. J. L. 400; State v. Blundell, 24 N. J. L. 402; State v. Powers, 24 N. J. L. 406; State v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures (N. J.) 4 Cent. Rep. 139.

A corporate charter of a cemetery company, which provides that the premises, burial lots, vaults, monuments, and other erections and fixtures shall not be subject to any assessments, taxes, or fines until otherwise ordered by the board of chosen freeholders of the county, and which constitutes an irrevocable contract, was held effective to exempt the corporation from a municipal assessment for a street improvement, although specially authorized by an act of the legislature, so long as such county board has taken no action in the premises. Mt. Pleasant Cemetery Co. v. Newark, 52 N. J. L. 539, 20 Atl. 832.

A case very like this is Colston v. Eastern Cemetery Co. 12 Ky. L. Rep. 763, 15 S. W. 245, which held that a similar exemption in the corporate charter covered with immunity lands not yet taken up for graves, as well as funds in trust to improve, care for, and ornament the burial grounds.

Provisions in an incorporating statute authorizing a railroad company to build, equip, and operate a line from a city within to a city outside of the enacting state, and charge and collect fares and tolls for transportation and carriage of passengers and freight, and requiring such railroad to pay the state one fifth of its gross collections for passenger fares on its line, constitute, when formally accepted by the company, a binding contract between the state and the corporation, and valid acts of legislation. The objection is not open that the effect and operation of such contract is to impose a 20 per cent capitation tax upon the right of travelers to enter, leave, or pass through the state, and hence violative of the constitutional rights of citizens of the United States. State v. Baltimore v. O. R. Co. 34 Md. 374, Affirmed in 21 Wall. 456, 22 L. ed. 678.

Anticipated public benefits are sufficient consideration to support a contract of exemption from taxation in a corporate charter. Carondelet Canal Nav. Co. v. New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 394, 10 So. 871; First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Parcher, 14 Minn. 297, Gil. 224.

Railroads holding charters which during a stated period from the completion of the road exempt from taxation the corporate stock and the real estate that may be purchased therewith and be connected with, and subservient to the corporate works thereby authorized, and which forever exempt from taxation, state and local, the capital stock, the dividends thereon, and all the property and estate, real and personal, until the dividends exceed legal interest, after which the stock and dividends may be taxed like other money at interest and the interest thereof, are, until the specified period has run, and while the dividends have not exceeded the stated rate, not taxable in virtue of a statute imposing a state tax of 1 per cent on the gross incomes of all railroads not exempted by law. State ex rel. South Carolina R. Co. v. Hood, 15 Rich. L. 177.

A railroad charter declaring that the capital stock of the company, and all other property belonging to or connected with its road, shall be exempt from all taxation for a certain number of years after the road shall be in operation, prevents the legislature from levying even a privilege or franchise tax upon the corporation before the stated period expires. Grand Gulf & P. G. R. Co. v. Buck, 53 Miss. 246.

The act of Congress incorporating the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and granting a right of way to construct a railroad and telegraph line through the public lands to the extent of 200 feet in width each side of the track where it passed through the public domain, including all necessary grounds for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, slide tracks, turntables, and water stations; and declaring that the right of way should be exempt from taxation within the territories of the United States through which it passed, constituted a contract that it was not afterwards in the power of Congress or of any territorial legislature, to impair by imposing any tax upon the right of way. Hence, a tax assessed upon such company under the designation "20 miles of railroad and rolling stock," by the officials of a territorial county, was held invalid. Northern P. R. Co. v. Carland, 5 Mont. 146, 3 Pac. 134.

A congressional grant to a state of all the overflowed and swamp lands in such state belonging to the United States, on condition that these or the proceeds thereof be applied, as far as necessary, in reclaiming them for cultivation by means of levees and drains, which the state accepts, and follows by legislation providing for the sale of such lands, for the issue of transferable scrip receivable for any lands not already taken at the time of selection by the holder, for contracts for making levees and true, these expressions have not all the weight of authority, for they were not necessary to the decisions made, but they are worthy of consideration, and they are in accordance with what seems to be sound reason." Justice Strong, who delivered this opinion, also delivered the opinion in 92 U. S., where, at page 671, 23 L. ed. page 760, he referred, in the spirit of criticism, to these cases. It is therefore noteworthy that three years later, after fuller consideration, he says, speaking for a unanimous court: "They are in accordance with sound reason." The authority in 98 U. S. 361, 25 L. ed. 186, was to "consolidate their stocks, upon such terms as might be agreed upon by the directors, and ratified by a majority of the stockholders;" and it was unanimously held that it was not merger, as in 92 U. S. 665, 23 L. ed. 757, nor alliance or confederation, but consolidation, resulting in the formation of a new company. Said the court, at page 364, 98 U. S., page 187, 25 L. ed.: "When, as in this case, the stock of two companies is consolidated, the stockholders become partners, or quasi partners, in a new concern. Each set of stockholders is shorn of the power which as a [separate] body it had before. Its action is controlled by a power outside of itself. To illustrate: The stockholders of the Savannah & Albany Railroad Company could not after consolidation have exercised any of the powers or franchises they had prior to their consolidation with the stockholders of the Atlantic & Gulf Railroad Company. They could not have built their road or controlled its management. They could not, therefore, have performed the duties which by their original charter were imposed upon them. Those duties could only drains, and for the payment of contractors in scrip or otherwise; and providing, also, to encourage reclamation, that such lands shall be exempt from taxation for ten years, or until reclaimed,—constitutes a state contract with the holders of such scrip for tax exemption accordingly. A law enacted after the issue of such scrip, repealing the exemption clause and authorizing a special tax upon the granted lands to meet the cost of building levees and drains thereby authorized, is, therefore, void for violating the contract clause in the Federal Constitution. McGee v. Mathis, 4 Wall. 143, 18 L. ed. 314.

The corporate charter of a lottery company, providing that it should pay the state annually $40,000 in quarterly payments, to be credited to the educational fund, and that it should thereupon be exempt from all other taxes and licenses of every kind whatever, state, parish, and municipal, which charter the legislature, attempted to repeal by a later statute and to abolish the company, but which, later still, a constitutional amendment restored with some modifications not affecting the tax immunity, was decided to amount to a contract with the state which could not be impaired by the imposition of other and additional taxation. New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 30 L. ed. 411, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198.

A clause in a railroad charter that no tax shall ever be laid on said road or its fixtures which will reduce the dividends below 8 per cent constitutes a binding contract with the state. Its force is not weakened by indefiniteness as to what the dividends are to be computed upon, since obviously capital stock is intended, nor by the fact that taxation is made to depend upon a future contingency. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968.

When there is inserted in a statute incorporating a bank an exemption relieving the corporation and its capital stock from the payment of all taxes during the corporate term, and the legislature enacts successive renewals of such charter with all the powers, privileges, immunities, and benefits enjoyed under the original act of incorporation, each upon consideration of a cash bonus paid into the state treasury, the original exemption continues unimpaired for the term of each renewal, and precludes the taxation of the stockholders upon their stock in such bank locally not less than by the state. Hence, a municipal ordinance of the city where such stockholders reside, imposing a tax of 5 per cent on dividends from bank stock, passed pursuant to legislative authority 60 L. R. A.

to make such assessments on its citizens or those holding taxable property within such city for the safety, convenience, benefit, and advantage of such city as shall appear to be expedient, cannot be enforced against such stockholders. State ex rel. Sebring v. Charleston, 5 Rich. L. 562.

This decision was in line with State Bank v. Charleston, 3 Rich. L. 342, that held the real property of such banks, although within the city limits, exempt from taxation by the city council.

A railroad company with banking powers and privileges, whose charter stipulates that the stock of the company and its branches shall be exempt for a term of years, and afterwards shall be subject to a tax not exceeding $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on the net proceeds of its investment, is not taxable upon its real estate and banking capital by a municipality through or into which its railroad extends, and is taxable by the state only, and to the extent limited by its charter. And this, notwithstanding an amendment to such charter declaring that it should not be so construed as to exempt from taxation, at the discretion of the legislature, the banking part of the capital stock, in the absence of any express exercise of such legislative discretion. Augusta v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 26 Ga. 651.

Contracts between governments and corporations in relation to taxation do not solely arise out of charters, but are sometimes made by independent instruments or special acts. Municipal franchise or license ordinances are familiar instances. As a matter of course, the same principles apply to these that are applicable to charter compacts.

A municipal ordinance authorizing and empowering an electric light company to erect poles and run wires upon, over, and across all the streets, alleys, avenues, and public places, and to maintain an electric-light outfit in the city for twenty years, accepted by the company and followed by its constructing a plant for the purpose of lighting the city, setting up poles and stringing wires, all at great expense; and again followed by an agreement with the city to light the streets with a certain number of arc lights of a stated candle power for ten years, under penalty of a daily pecuniary forfeit for failure of light power after a short period,—constitute altogether an executed contract between the city and the corporation. This contract the city is not at liberty to impair. An ordinance exacting a license tax of 50 cents each for the privilege of erecting and maintaining poles in the streets, and as a compensation for the use of the streets for the same, is, there-have been performed by another organization composed partly of themselves and partly of others. Their powers, their franchises, and their privileges were therefore gone,—no longer capable of exercise or enjoyment. Gone where? Into the new organization, the consolidated company, which exists alone by virtue of the legislative grant, and which has all its powers, facilities, and privileges by virtue of the consolidation act. What, then, was left of the old companies? Apparently nothing. They must have passed out of existence, and the new company must have succeeded to their rights and duties. But the new company comes into existence under a fresh grant. Not only its being, but its powers, its franchises, and immunities, are grants of the legislature which gave it its existence." Since, then, a consolidation of the stock of two corporations means the creation of a new corporation, it necessarily follows that the power to consolidate given by this § 16, supra, did not authorize a merger, or any consolidation except such as resulted in the formation of a new company. The next source of power to consolidate is § 25, Acts 1882, p. 932, supra. That provides "that the company shall have power and authority to . . . consolidate the company with any other company, under the name [not under the name and charter, as in 92 U. S. 667, 23 L. ed. 759], of one or both; but when such . . . consolidation is effected, the said company shall be entitled to all the benefits, rights, franchises, lands, and property of every description belonging to said road or roads so consolidated." The language here sharply distinguishes between the old companies and the new in a way that makes it perfectly clear the fore, void. Hot Springs Electric Light Co. v. Hot Springs, 70 Ark. 300, 67 S. W. 761.

An interesting controversy in this regard arose between the city of St. Louis and the Western Union Telegraph Company. In 1881 the city passed an ordinance relative to planting poles and stringing wires in the streets for telegraph companies (Ord. 11,604), of which § 8 ordained that any company erecting poles under the provisions of such ordinance should, before obtaining a permit therefor from the board of public improvements, file an agreement in the office of the city register permitting the city of St. Louis to occupy and use the top cross arm of any pole erected, or which was already set up, for the use of the city for telegraph purposes free of charge. The Western Union Telegraph Company accepted this ordinance and complied with its terms. A few years afterwards the municipal assembly amended the ordinance, and added several sections thereto, one of which provided that from and after a named date in the then future all telegraph and telephone companies not taxed by ordinance for city purposes on their gross incomes should pay the city of St. Louis, for the privilege of using its streets, alleys, and public places, $5 a year for every telegraph or telephone pole erected or used by them therein. (Ord. No. 12,733, § 11, March 23, 1884.) The city, having sued the Western Union to recover $22,635 alleged to have accrued in virtue of this amended ordinance, met defeat at first on the ground that it provided for a license or privilege tax upon the instrumentalities of interstate commerce, and so was invalid. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. 59.

But this decision was reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial, by the Supreme Court of the United States in 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485, Rehearing denied, 149 U. S. 465, 37 L. ed. 810, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 990.

Upon the new trial with additional proof, it was considered that, under the decision of the Supreme Court, two principal questions were involved, one of these being: Did the passage of § 8 of the old ordinance, on its acceptance by the company, and the erection and acquisition thereafter of additional poles, and the use, ever since continued by the city, of both old and new poles free of charge, amount to a contract between the city and the company which would be violated by enforcing the new ordinance? And this question was answered affirmatively by the decision, and the city was again defeated. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 63 Fed. 68. 60 L. R. A.

A very similar case arose in New Orleans, when that city, after granting a telegraph company authority to construct and maintain its lines without limitation as to time and with no other consideration than the furnishing of certain free telephonic facilities to the city, undertook, by another ordinance, after the company had established its plant, constructed its lines, and complied with the conditions, to exact $5 a year for each pole. The Louisiana supreme court refused its sanction, and held the imposition void for impairing a contract obligation, saying, if the city could at that time exact a large additional consideration for the continued enjoyment of privileges already granted, she could have done so the very day after the defendant had invested its money, and before it received a particle of return: and if she could charge $5 a pole, she could with equal power charge $1,000, or revoke arbitrarily the grant at pleasure. She was either bound by the terms of her proposition accepted and acted upon, or not at all. And thereupon the court concluded, "upon the clearest principles of law and justice," that the grant of authority, when accepted and acted upon, became an irrevocable contract, and that the city was powerless to set it aside or to interpolate new and more onerous considerations therein. New Orleans v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 40 La. Ann. 41, 3 So. 533.

The principle that municipal ordinances granting corporations such as telegraph and street railway companies the right to construct lines in the streets amount to irrevocable contracts which the municipality may not afterwards impair by exacting additional considerations or imposing new burdens has been recognized and applied in many cases. Chicago v. Sheldon, 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. ed. 594; Western Paving & Supply Co. v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 128 Ind. 525, 10 L. R. A. 770, 26 N. E. 188, 28 N. E. 88; State ex rel. Kansas v. Corrigan Consol. Street R. Co. 85 Mo. 263, 55 Am. Rep. 861; Kansas City v. Corrigan, 86 Mo. 67; Coast-Line R. Co. v. Savannah, 30 Fed. 646; State, Hudson Teleph. Co., Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 49 N. J. L. 303, 60 Am. Rep. 619, 8 Atl. 123; Rutland Electric Light Co. v. Marble City Electric Light Co. 65 Vt. 377, 20 L. R. A. 821, 26 Atl. 635.

2. Commutations.

There is an obvious distinction between contracts for a total immunity from taxation and those for the payment of specific and certain taxes as substitutes for taxation in other and general forms. But, plain as it is, the distinc-legislature meant the consolidation to result in the creation of a new corporation. Said company (that is, the new consolidated company) may be under the name of one, but not the charter of one. On the contrary, it (said company) shall be entitled to all the benefits, etc., belonging to said roads (all of them) so consolidated. Manifestly, the legislative purpose here was the consolidation of two or more companies into one new company. No power can be found here for merger. The next source of power to consolidate is § 5 of the Acts of 1882, p. 843, which provides: "Said company may consolidate with any other railroad company in or out of the state of Mississippi upon such terms as the consolidated company may agree upon; and upon any such consolidation the consolidated company shall have and enjoy all the property, rights, privileges, powers, liberties, and immunities and franchises herein granted; but such consolidation shall not have the effect of exempting from taxation the railroad or property owned by such other consolidated company prior to its consolidation with the company hereby chartered; nor of exempting from taxation any property which the consolidated company may, after such consolidation, acquire under the provisions of the charter of such other consolidating company." Clearly, here, also, it is consolidation, and not merger, which is provided for, and such consolidation as should result in a new company,—a "consolidated company which should" enjoy all the property, etc., of its previously existing constituent companies. It will not fail to be noted that in none of these acts is the word "merger" ever used. Always and everywhere it is consolidation alone that is au-tion is generally ignored in the decisions. The courts for the most part consider charter contracts for commuted taxes as if, like those conferring exemptions, they were altogether to the advantage and benefit of the taxpayer, and not at all to that of the state. The cases are rare where a different view is taken.

It is a part of the legislative history of Minnesota declared the supreme court of that state quite recently in deciding one of the numerous cases wherein county authorities sought to tax the lands granted to railroads in aid of their construction, both as a territory and as a state, that its policy in regard to taxing land-grant roads was adopted with reference alike to facilitating the early construction of these lines of road, and to securing to the state what was supposed an ultimate and adequate return for the value of the franchises conferred, and which would, in the long run, be equivalent to the companies' fair share of taxation. The policy was to provide for these companies paying to the state a certain percentage of their gross earnings in lieu of all other taxation. Traverse County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 73 Minn. 417, 76 N. W. 217.

And, it added, further on: It has been repeatedly held by this court, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the substitution of an assessment upon gross earnings in lieu of all other taxes on the road and the granted lands does not exempt the lands from taxation, but merely substitutes one method of taxation for another upon the terms and conditions specified; and for that reason the latter court, which is very tenacious of the doctrine that an exemption from taxation must be clearly shown and strictly construed, has held that this doctrine does not apply, at least to its full extent, in such a case. Ibid.

The two cases in the United States Supreme Court, cited as authority for this last proposition, afford it considerable support. Northern P. R. Co. v. Clark, 153 U. S. 252, 38 L. ed. 706, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 641, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809; McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 42 L. ed. 614, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242.

The rule that a statute exempting from taxation, says the New York supreme court, in a late case in that state, must be so clear that there can be neither reasonable doubt nor controversy about its terms; that the language must be such as to leave no room for discussion; and that all doubts must be resolved against the exemption, does not apply to a statute which substitutes for one in vogue a new method of taxation, and relieves the subject thereof from the old burden. Such a statute is not one that exempts from its due proportion of the general burdens of government within the rule. Binghamton Trust Co. v. Binghamton, 72 App. Div. 341, 76 N. Y. Supp. 517.

The Wisconsin supreme court, in construing a statute of that state which gave to a railroad company an exemption of its track, right of way, depot grounds, buildings, machine shops, rolling stock and other property necessarily used in railroad operation from taxation upon the payment of a gross earnings tax in lieu thereof, in order to determine whether or not the exemption extended to a railroad hotel and restaurant on the line of the road, said, in substance, that in other states the statutes not only differed, but the courts were governed by the rule or maxim of construction that statutes exempting property from the burden of general taxation are to be most strictly construed against the corporation or party benefited thereby and in favor of the public. It is not easy to say, it added, that this rule has any application in the present case, or, if it has, that it applies with much force. The payment by the railway companies of the gross-earnings tax to "take the place and be in full of all the other taxes of every name and kind" upon the roads, their property and the shares of their stock, must, in the light of past legislation upon the subject, be regarded as, in the judgment of the legislature, an equivalent for the taxes which the companies would otherwise be required to pay if assessed and taxed by the ordinary methods. A strict construction, therefore, against the company, or a liberal one in favor of the public, can with difficulty be justified in view of what seems to have been the legislative intent; and it would seem that little or no effect can be given to the rule. We are at liberty, therefore, and, indeed, required, to give the statute a fair and liberal construction in favor of the company, or such an one as it should receive supposing there is no injustice in the claim made by the company or advantage to be gained by it over the public. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Crawford County, 29 Wis. 116.

This view was again adopted, and the case approved, a few years later, in Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 34 Wis. 271.

And as recently as 1837 the same court remarked of a similar statute, that if it were a question of construction the act would, for the reasons stated in those cases, have to be liberally construed in favor of the corporation. Milwaukee Electric R. & Light Co. v. Milwaukee, 95 Wis. 42, 60 N. W. 796.

On the other hand, the supreme court of Louisiana has in two cases laid down the propthorized. If merger merely was intended, what was easier than to have used the words appropriate to manifest that intention? Why this careful and exclusive use of the word "consolidation?" And not of this word only, but of other terms indicating a clear intention to create a new consolidated company? We conclude, therefore, on a review of the statutes authorizing the consolidation under review, that, so far as the purpose of the legislature was concerned, it was its clear purpose that consolidation, and not merger, should occur, and such consolidation as should result in the creation of a new corporation.

Counsel for the railroad company relies on three authorities especially to show that what the legislature here intended was merger: Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. 460, 21 L. ed. 189; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia, 92 U. S. 666, 23 L. ed. 758, and Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 313. But, in Tomlinson v. Branch, Mr. Justice Bradley properly characterized what was done as "amalgamation," which is merger, and not consolidation (p. 463, 15 Wall., p. 190, 21 L. ed.), and the act of the legislature expressly provided for merger. It provided (p. 463, L. ed. p. 190) that "the said South Carolina Canal & Railroad Company shall be merged in the said South Carolina Railroad Company," and provided expressly that the South Carolina Railroad Company should retain its autonomy and previous existence. There was no room for construction in this case, and it was conceded on all hands that what occurred was merger. So, in Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia, it was expressly provided (92 U. S. 671, 23 L. ed. 760) that the union should take place under "the name omission that the power to commute taxes is but an incident of the power to exempt, and when the latter does not exist the incidental power must be denied. New Orleans v. St. Charles Street R. Co. 28 La. Ann. 497; Louisiana Cotton Mfg. Co. v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 440.

And this proposition is adopted in unqualified terms by the supreme court of Texas, which adds on its own account that the thing given or paid in commutation is but the price paid for exemption from liability to do some act or to pay some other sum. Austin v. Austin Gaslight & Coal Co. 69 Tex. 180, 7 S. W. 200.

In a modern New Jersey case, Depue, J., writing for the majority of the court of errors and appeals, says: The contract between the Morris & Essex Railroad Company and the state is a contract for the commutation of taxes by the payment annually of a certain percentage upon the cost of its railroad, in lieu of other taxation. The legal effect of the contract is to secure to the company immunity from other taxation in consideration of the prescribed tax to be paid. It is a privilege of a personal character, entirely distinct from the franchises of the corporation, etc., etc. Thereupon the learned gentleman proceeds to build his argument and cite his authorities precisely as if the contract he has just spoken of was one of exemption from, instead of for a commutation of, taxation. State Board v. Morris & E. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 193, 7 Atl. 826.

The general proposition, that a provision in a corporate charter for the payment of a stated commutation tax in lieu of all other taxes relieves the commuting taxpayer, not merely from franchise and privilege taxes, imposts and excises, but, as well, the corporation generally from taxes upon its property to which, in common with individuals, it would have been subjected, whether state or local, but for such provision, is well established. State v. Berry, 17 N. J. L. 80; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hillegas, 18 N. J. L. 11; Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. v. Appeal Comrs. 18 N. J. L. 71; Gardner v. State, 21 N. J. L. 557; State v. Bank of Smyrna, 2 Houst. (Del.) 99, 73 Am. Dec. 699; Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Neary, 5 Del. Ch. 600, 8 Atl. 363; Farmers' Bank v. Com. 6 Bush, 127; State v. Butler, 13 Lea. 400; Daughdrill v. Alabama Life Ins. & T. Co. 31 Ala. 91; Le Roy v. East Saginaw City R. Co. 18 Mich. 233, 100 Am. Dec. 162.

The exemption extends to local taxes because taxes for county and township purposes are as much state taxes as those imposed for state purposes, unless an express and definite distinction in terms is made in the statute granting the immunity. Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hillegas, 18 N. J. L. 11.

Because, too, a municipal corporation has no powers with respect of taxation that its creator state is without. Memphis v. Hernando Ins. Co. 6 Baxt. 527.

One case went even to the extent of holding that such a charter provision was effectual against a special assessment upon a railroad and its real estate for a local improvement. St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 469.

A provision in a railroad charter that its stock shall not be liable to any tax, duty, or imposition whatever, unless such and no more as is laid now on banks of the state, protects the company from any taxation upon its capital stock greater than the rate on bank stock at the time its charter was granted. But it leaves the company open to taxation upon its surplus at the same rate as other taxable property. Goldsmith v. Rome R. Co. 62 Ga. 473.

The case followed and reaffirmed that of Rome R. Co. v. Rome, 14 Ga. 275.

Although a provision in a charter for a specific tax upon the capital stock of a corporation is not a substitute for all other taxes, and hence does not confer immunity from ordinary taxation, yet, as it is a consideration paid and continued for the privilege of using the corporate franchise, it renders the corporation not amenable to taxes of this kind so long as the legislature does not see fit under its reserved power to change the rate. State v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 16 Lea, 111.

An agreement whereby a state gives permission to a foreign railroad corporation to build and operate within its borders a part of its line in consideration of the payment of $10,000 and annual taxes upon the cost of constructing that piece of road as so much of the capital stock employed within the state is no barrier to the enforcement of a subsequent tax act of such state requiring the railroad company to collect for the state a state tax upon its bonded debt so far as held by citizens of such state by deductions from interest payments thereon. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 150 Pa. 234, 24 Atl. 609.

But when a corporation is exempted by its charter from all taxes and licenses of any kind whatever in excess of a stated sum payable annually, a subsequent statute making an assessment, not upon the capital stock of the corporation, but upon the shares of its shareholders as these appear upon the corporate books, and requiring the tax so assessed to be paid by the corporation and by it collected from and charter of the Central Railroad & Banking Company." Merger was clearly provided for. Pages 671-673, L. ed. pp. 760, 761. And in Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala., the court lay stress upon the word "unite" (p. 319): "Were united with those of the Alabama company, and vested in it, so as to enable it (called in the contract the consolidated company, because their franchises were consolidated with its)," etc.,—a case, again, of merger. The authorities are wholly inapplicable to a case like this, where the statutes all sedulously avoid the word "merger," exclusively use the word "consolidate," and accompany that word, definite enough in itself, with other provisions which leave no doubt that consolidation resulting in the creation of a new corporation was intended.

Turning now from the legislative purpose, let us see what was actually done in pursuits stockholders, but paid absolutely, irrespective of any dividends or profits due the shareholders out of which the company may be repaid, is invalid, and the tax thus laid is void, because, being imposed substantially upon the corporation itself, it impairs the obligation in the charter. New Orleans v. Houston, 119 U. S. 265, 30 L. ed. 411, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198.

A provision in the charter of an urban railroad for the payment of a percentage of its net income, to be expended without entering the general municipal funds by a special commission appointed for the purpose, in improving the condition and appearance of, and in removing obstructions from, the city streets in which the line is built, and providing that such payment shall be legal compensation in full for the use and occupation of such streets, and shall constitute an agreement or contract between the city and the company entitling the latter to the privileges and the fares allowed by law not changeable without mutual consent, does not amount to a commuted or substituted system of taxation, but only provides for the payment of franchise fees; therefore the road is not exempt from taxation upon its rails, supports, foundations, and other structures as real estate, and upon its real and personal property generally. People ex rel. New York Elev. R. Co. v. New York Tax. & A. Comrs. 19 Hun, 460, Affirmed in 82 N. Y. 459.

A municipal ordinance providing for the payment, in lieu of all city taxes except a land tax, of a percentage of the gross receipts of a street railway company organized under a general statute of the state, which, amid many things, provided that no company formed under it should construct its road upon any city street without the consent of the municipal authorities, and save under such regulations and upon such terms as they should from time to time prescribe, with a proviso, however, that after such consent was given and its terms accepted no regulations or conditions should be made whereby the rights or franchises so granted should be destroyed or unreasonably impaired, or such company be deprived of the right to build, maintain, and operate its road in the streets, consented to upon the terms prescribed at the outset, constitutes a contract which the city may not impair by differently taxing, although the state, in the lawful exercise of its power of alteration and repeal, has changed the mode and standard of taxing such corporations for state purposes. Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. 76 Mich. 421, 43 N. W. 447.

The consideration that the city of Detroit in that case was clothed with the power to make ance of this power to consolidate: First. The stock of the two companies was consolidated. Learned counsel for the railroad insists that the testimony of Welling shows that the stock was never exchanged. He is mistaken in this. Welling does so state, but on cross-examination expressly declares on this very point: "I do not know as to that question. I do not recall the fact,—just what was done." And he is a witness for the railroads. This falls far short of showing that the stock was not exchanged. The other testimony shows it was. Second. The deed of consolidation on its face provides for and creates a new organization and new officers. See articles 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8. Third. The 5th article of consolidation conveys all the "rights, . . . property," etc., "of every kind belonging to either of the parties,—to the consolidated company, without the contract should be given due weight. If a municipality has not the power to agree with a local corporation for a commuted or substituted system of city taxation, an ordinance attempting so to do will fail to give protection because of inherent invalidity. Austin v. Austin Gaslight & Coal Co. 69 Tex. 180, 7 S. W. 200.

The commuted tax provided for, and the exemption from all other taxes granted in the act of incorporation and two successive supplements thereto passed by the New Jersey legislature for the Morris & Essex Railroad Company, were held, by the state supreme court (State, Morris & E. R. Co., Prosecutors, v. Railroad Taxation Comrs. 37 N. J. L. 228), and afterwards on appeal by the court of errors and appeals (38 N. J. L. 472), to constitute but a repealable contract. These decisions, however, were reversed by the United States Supreme Court, which held that the relevant statutory provisions, taken altogether, constituted an irrepealable contract on the subject of taxation between the state and the corporation, which the state was not at liberty to impair by subsequent legislation by the imposition of other taxes. New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352.

In consequence, the New Jersey court of errors afterwards declared that it must now necessarily be assumed by the courts of New Jersey that these acts constituted an inviolable contract of commutation and immunity; and that it was, therefore, established that any tax assessed against such road in contravention of the provisions of the charter act and its supplements is illegal. State Board v. Morris & E. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 193, 7 Atl. 826.

It is further, the case that by the lease made by that railroad to the Delaware, Lackawanna, & Western Railroad Company of its property and franchises for the full term of its chartered existence, and the validation thereof by act of the legislature,—both the indenture and the statute being couched in language sufficiently broad to carry over to the lessee company the right to commute and to be otherwise exempt from taxes, though these were not specifically mentioned,—gave to the lessee company the same rights, privileges, and immunities with respect of taxation as had been enjoyed by the lessor company. Ibid.

In a late Minnesota case (State ex rel. Marr v. Stearns, 72 Minn. 200, 75 N. W. 210, Reversed in Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. ed. 162, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73) the question was up, whether certain lands in that state, originally a part of the public lands of the United States and any further act, deed, or conveyance;" distinguishing clearly between the two previous companies—"either of the parties"—and the new company, the grantees, the "consolidated company." Fourth. The articles of incorporation themselves, on their face, declare that doubt exists as to the effect of what has been done, and conclude, most significantly: "But, whatever may be the legal consequence of the consolidation herein provided for, this agreement is to stand and be effective." This is pregnant with meaning. The railroad companies knew that the only power the legislature had given was to so consolidate as to create a new corporation, and that under § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 the exemption, if any existed, would be cut off. They knew the only word used was "consolidate" in all the legislative acts, and that merger and consolidation are very distinct and different things. And yet, not conforming to the power, but seeking to carry the exemption in spite of it, they used the words "unite, merge, and consolidate," and said that "such consolidation shall be effected by uniting or merging the stock, property, and franchises of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company with and into the stock, property, and franchises of the said Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, without disturbing the corporate existence of the last-named company, or the formation of any new distinct corporation, unless such result shall be necessary to give legal effect to this agreement; but, whatever may be the legal consequence of the consolidation herein provided for, this agreement is to stand and be effective." Doubtless, they desired to merge; but the legislature had only authorized con-granted by Congress to the state in trust to promote railroads, and afterwards by the state granted to certain railroad corporations, which were not used for railroad purposes, were taxable ad valorem under a statute so providing, but also providing that the railroads should continue the payment of the percentage of their gross earnings as fixed by a former statute, or whether such lands were free from ad valorem taxation by virtue of such prior legislation that the gross earnings tax should be in lieu of all other taxes upon the property of the roads. In other words, did the earlier legislation commuting taxes constitute an irrevocable contract so that the new tax act was void for impairing it, or, if there was no contract, or but a repealable one, was the new tax invalid for any other reason? The Minnesota Constitution had always provided that all taxes raised in the state should be as nearly equal as possible, and that all property on which taxes are levied should have a cash valuation equalized and uniform throughout the state; that laws should be passed taxing all money, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise, and also all real and personal property according to its true value in money; that certain kinds of property, not inclusive of railroad lands, should be exempt from taxation by general laws. By state statutes,—acts of incorporation, for change of name, and land grants,—and acts of Congress on which they were based, covering a period from 1850 to 1865 there vested in the railroads certain public lands, and the grantees were required to pay annually 3 per cent of their gross earnings "in lieu and in full of all taxation and assessments" upon the railroads, their appurtenances and appendages, and all their other property, real, personal, and mixed, including the lands granted thereby or theretofore, or so intended to be. There were provisions that when sold these lands should become taxable. In 1871 Minnesota amended her Constitution. The new instrument provided, in substance, that any amendment or repeal of any law providing for the payment of a percentage tax on railroad earnings in lieu of other taxes should, before taking effect, be submitted to, and approved by, a popular vote. The railroads paid their respective percentage taxes, their lands remained unassessed, and the validity of the commutation and exemption acts remained unchallenged in the courts and legislature for about thirty years. A statute, enacted in 1895, and approved the next year by the people, subjected the railroad lands to ad valorem taxes, while requiring their owners to continue paying, as 60 L. R. A.

before, the 3 per cent gross earnings tax. The Minnesota supreme court held (State ex rel. Marr v. Stearns, 72 Minn. 200, 75 N. W. 210), that the acts of commutation and exemption were when passed unconstitutional for repugnancy to the uniformity and equality of taxation clause in the state organic law, and until the amendment of the Constitution in 1871; but that the effect of that amendment was qualifiedly to vivify them, subject to the right to alter, amend, or repeal them, provided the statute exercising that right should be ratified by a popular vote. Hence, it concluded that the act of 1895, taxing the lands, impaired no contract, and that the tax imposed thereby was valid.

The United States Supreme Court was unanimous in reversing this decision, but a majority of its members did not agree upon the grounds. Brewer, J., with the concurrence of Fuller, Ch. J., Peckham and Shiras, JJ., was of the opinion that the original statutes did constitute an irrevocable contract; that, notwithstanding the state Constitution Minnesota took these lands from the United States in trust to aid railroad construction and as public lands exempt ab initio from taxation; that in the discharge of that trust she was competent to continue the exemption to her railroad grantees, and to fulfil the trust in any proper way. Hence he concluded there was a valid, irrevocable contract, and the tax act of 1895 was void for impairing it. White, J., with the concurrence of Harlan, Gray, and McKenna, JJ., refused to admit that the exempting and commuting statutes amounted to irrevocable contracts. He opined that they really were unconstitutional when enacted, and, so were only validated by the amendment of 1871, in virtue of which they became subject to alteration and repeal. Hence, he concluded that the tax act of 1895 was not void for impairing a contract obligation. But he held that, forasmuch as the act taxing the lands required the railroads to continue paying the 3 per cent gross earnings tax, and in the same breath took away part of the consideration, to wit, the exemption of their lands from ad valorem taxes upon which their acceptance and agreement was founded, without consent or compensation, the act was void because it deprived the companies of their property without due process of law, and denied them the equal protection of the laws. Brown, J., alone, held that the acquiescence for thirty years of the legislature and courts of Minnesota in the validity of the commutation and exemption acts, and in the investment and growth of railroad properties upon the faith of solidation, and such consolidation as necessarily resulted in the creation of a new corporation, and they could only lawfully do what the legislature in fact authorized, not what they might wish to do. And the words "consolidate upon such terms as they might agree upon" mean that the thing done must be consolidation, but the mere administrative details of uniting the two into one new corporation were left to the companies. Names count for nothing. It is substance courts look to. Consolidation resulting in the creation of a new corporation is what the legislature authorized, is what the articles of consolidation actually effected, and it is utterly beyond the power of the railroad companies to change the essential nature of what was done by calling it "merger."

We have not adverted to all the considerations sustaining this view. The closer the analysis of the articles of consolidation, and of the action of the authorities of the two companies, the more indisputably it appears that such consolidation as resulted in the creation of a new corporation was precisely what was effected. The notice for a meeting of the stockholders called for August 1, 1893, is a meeting of the stockholders of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. The minutes recite that it was a meeting of the stockholders of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, and give the number of shares, and names of the holders; and all this is true, also, of the meeting of stockholders of October 4, 1893. Again, on August 1, 1893, a resolution was passed "that the stock, property, and franchises of said two corporations had been merged or united in one single corporation, under the corporate name of the Yazoo & such validity, had established a rule of property in the state that it was too late to overturn. Stearns v. Minnesota, 179 U. S. 223, 45 L. ed. 162, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73.

The decision, then, is reduced to this: When a state has by statute granted lands to a railroad, and stipulated that they shall be free from taxes in consideration of the payment, instead of a gross-earnings tax, it cannot afterwards tax the lands and exact the gross-earnings tax as well. If it attempts to do so, the late act is void either because it impairs a contract or else, if there is no contract to impair, because it deprives the taxpayer of his property without due process of law, or denies him the equal protection of the laws. The act may also be void because the state has estopped itself by allowing, through long inaction, an adverse rule of property to be established.

3. The Ohio bank cases.

The Ohio bank tax cases are a group by themselves. In them was carried on, and finally decided, a great controversy over the constitutional power of a state legislature by statutory contract in an incorporation act to surrender beyond recall any part of the sovereign power of taxation. The debate engaged the Supreme Court of the United States upon one side and the supreme court of Ohio upon the other; the former affirming, against the earnest protest of some of its members, and the latter denying, with practical unanimity, the existence of any such power,—at least in the legislature of Ohio. The contesting parties were the state of Ohio and the Ohio state bank, its branches and associates, to the number of fifty. The discussion waged about three principal questions: 1. Did the statute under which the banks were chartered contain any irrevocable contract limiting taxation? 2. Has an American state legislature the power to make such a contract? 3. Supposing state legislatures in general possessed of such power, did it belong to the Ohio legislature in view of the limitations in the Constitution of the state? It is conceivable that a common ground of agreement might have been found in a negative answer to the third of these questions, but it was not very earnestly sought for, nor was the question itself throughout the entire controversy treated as one of prime importance.

The first Constitution of Ohio was adopted November 29, 1802. It contained a general grant of legislative authority to the general assembly, and (art. 8, § 28) this express declaration: "To guard against the transgression of the high powers which we have delegated, we declare that all powers not hereby delegated remain with the people." It continued in force without change until September 1, 1851. It was the organic law of the state when the statute authorizing the incorporation of these banks was enacted,—the law relied upon as containing the contract between the state and the banks in respect of limited taxation.

The Commercial Bank of Cincinnati was incorporated by special statute February 11, 1829. Its charter provided, inter alia, that the state of Ohio should be entitled to receive 4 per cent on all dividends made by the bank, and that the demand and payment of that amount should be made agreeably to the provisions of the act of February 5, 1825, amendatory of the earlier act of 1816 to incorporate certain banks and extend the charters of others. The so-called amendatory act was the first law of Ohio levying in terms a tax upon banks.

The charter was afterwards amended, but in other particulars than in respect of taxation. In 1831 an act to tax banks, insurance and bridge companies at the rate of 5 per cent on dividends was enacted. This bank was within the terms of the last act, unless protected by its charter. The Ohio supreme court, in 1835, decided that the charter constituted a contract which prevented the state from exacting any higher tax than 4 per cent on the bank dividends. State v. Commercial Bank, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 125.

The constitutional power of the legislature to make such contract was assumed in the case without discussion. The case itself was afterwards expressly, emphatically, and repeatedly overruled in the later decisions of the Ohio supreme court. February 24, 1845, the Ohio legislature passed an act to incorporate the state bank of Ohio and other banking companies. Of that act, § 60 provided: That each banking company under the act, on accepting and complying with its provisions, should semi-annually, on the days designated for declaring dividends, set off to the state 6 per cent on its profits, deducting therefrom the expenses and ascertained losses of the company for the six months next preceding, which sum or amount so set off should be in lieu of all taxes to which the company or the stock holders would otherwise be subject; the sum so set off to be paid to the treasurer on the order of the auditor of the state. About fifty banks, either branches of the Ohio state bank, or independent institutions, were organized under this act. In 1851 the legislature passed an act to tax banks and bank and other stocks the same as other property was then taxable under the laws of the Mississippi Valley Railroad Company." Another resolution was passed, reciting that the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company was the "successor" or assignee of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company. Of course, the mere name, Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, is utterly immaterial in determining whether it is attached to the same old company known as the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, or to the consolidated company,—the new company; and this action of the stockholders, as well as the articles of consolidation, pointed clearly to the same result,—consolidation, and not merger. The new company was the successor or assignee of the two old companies, and the language of Mr. Justice Brown, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 309, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, fits in here as if uttered for this case: "It is impossible to conceive of a corporation existing without stock or certificates representing the interests of the corporators in the organization. Now, if the act provides [the deed in the case at bar] that these certificates shall be surrendered, and certificates in another company issued in their place, what becomes of the prior companies? Who are their stockholders? Who their officers? [The deed in this case appoints an entirely new set of officers. See Charter Book, pp. 731, 732.] If the stock in the new company is sold, what interest in the prior companies passes by the sale? There can be but one answer to these questions. The property and franchises of the prior companies are gone, as much as if they had formally surrendered their charters. The new company state. The effort to tax the banks in virtue of this act provoked strenuous resistance. In the litigations which at once followed the supreme court of the state decided that the tax was valid and must be paid. It held: (1) That § 60 of the banking act of 1845 contained no pledge by the state not to alter or change the method or rate of taxation, and had none of the elements of an irrepealable contract between the state and the banks; (2) that if that section could be construed to the contrary, it would amount to a surrender of the sovereign power of taxation, and thus be inoperative and void for want of any power in the general assembly to make it. Debolt v. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. 1 Ohio St. 563; Mechanics' & T. Branch of State Bank v. Debolt, 1 Ohio St. 591; Knoup v. Piqua Branch of State Bank, 1 Ohio St. 603; Bank of Toledo v. Toledo, 1 Ohio St. 622.

These cases were decided at the January term in 1853, and the opinions in them were written by four different members of the court. The corporation in the first of these cases was not organized under the act of 1845, but by an act passed several years before. It claimed the benefits of the act of 1845 by virtue of a section in its charter which read: No higher taxes shall be levied on the capital stock or dividends of the company than are or may be levied on the capital stock or dividends of incorporated banking institutions in this state. Each of the other corporations was organized under the act of 1845. In the first case, Ranney, J., while intimating that the circumstances of its origin might take the corporation out of the class in which the others were, did not find it necessary in the view taken by the court of the scope and effect of the act of 1845, to enlarge upon the point. The whole case is made to depend upon whether § 60 of the act of 1845 constituted an irrepealable contract respecting taxation which the legislature enacting it had constitutional power to make. A lack of space forbids outlining the argument of the Ohio judges, even on the single question of legislative power. Many of the points made will appear before the subdivision closes, but the reader interested should consult the full reports.

The court followed and approved these cases, and reached the same conclusion, in the December term of the same year. Exchange Bank v. Hines, 3 Ohio St. 1.

In the meantime, the banks carried the cases to the United States Supreme Court on writs of error. The first case to be decided in that tribunal was that of the Piqua Branch Bank. It was therein held that § 60 of the act of 1845 did not merely prescribe a rule for taxing the banks which the state might change at pleasure, but that it was a contract which could not be impaired by subsequent legislation. That the act of 1851 to tax banks and bank and other stocks the same as other property was taxable, under which the Piqua Branch Bank had been assessed upon its capital stock and contingent and surplus funds, impaired the obligation of that contract, and was void for conflict with the Federal Constitution. A state, it was said, in granting privileges to a bank with a view of affording a sound currency, or of advancing any policy connected with the public interest, exercises its sovereignty, and for a public purpose of which it is the exclusive judge. Under such circumstances, a contract made for a specific tax is binding. This tax continues although all other banks should be exempted from taxation. Having the power to make it, and rights becoming vested under it, it can no more be disregarded, nor set aside by a subsequent legislature, than can a grant of land. (McLean, J.) And again: Every valuable privilege given by the charter, and which conduces to an acceptance of it and an organization under it, is a contract which cannot be changed by the legislature where the power to do so is not reserved in the charter. The rate of discount, the duration of the charter, the specific tax agreed to be paid, and other provisions essentially connected with the franchise and necessary to the business of the bank cannot, without its consent, become a subject for legislative action. Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoup, 16 How. 369, 14 L. ed. 977.

There were three dissentients from this decision.—Catron, Daniel, and Campbell, JJ. Mr. Justice Catron put the dissent upon three grounds: 1. That § 60 of the Ohio banking act of 1845 did not, for reasons stated by his colleague, Campbell J., constitute an irrepealable contract. 2. That the taxing power is not the subject of a contract so as to be bartered away irrevocably. Each successive legislature is vested with it unimpaired and unhampered by the action of its predecessors. A legislature may grant an exemption from taxation, but only for so long a time as the needs of the state do not require its modification. (3) The Ohio Constitution was so phrased that the legislature of that state, according to the interpretation of the state supreme court, had not the power to contract away permanently the right to tax. He did not undertake to say whether this was a sound interpretation, it was conclusive because made by the highest state court concerning its own Constitution. 1864.

may doubtless receive, by transmission from its constituent companies, their property, rights, privileges, and franchises, including any immunity from taxation; but it receives them as an heir receives the estate of his ancestor, or as a grantee receives the estate of his grantor,—by inheritance, succession, or purchase. The result is not a mere union or partnership of two companies, nor the merger of the franchises of one in another, but the extinguishment of one, and the creation of another in its place. . . . It follows from this that, when the new corporation came into existence, it came precisely as if it had been organized under a charter granted at the date of the consolidation, and subject to the constitutional provisions then existing." To the same effect, also, is St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 469-475, 28 L. ed. 1056-1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529.

The Ohio Life Insurance & Trust Company was unsuccessful in its efforts to escape the same tax. It was held that the provision in its charter that no higher taxes should be levied on its capital stock or dividends than were or might be levied upon those of other incorporated banking institutions in the state only entitled it to the same rate of taxation as was, or might be, imposed by general laws upon banks and banking institutions, and not to the benefit of any special or particular rate that might be levied pursuant to a special contract with one or more favored bodies corporate. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 416, 14 L. ed. 997.

The Ohio supreme court did not bow. In December, 1854, it again declared that "the Constitution of the state does not clothe the general assembly with the authority to surrender or part with any portion whatever of the taxing power by contract or sale. That the legislature of this state has not the constitutional authority, in conferring special privileges on corporations, to abridge or in any manner whatever surrender any portion of the right of taxation, has been settled by solemn adjudication, and is not now an open question in this state." Milan & R. Pl. Road Co. v. Husted, 3 Ohio St. 578.

In 1852 the Ohio legislature passed an act for the assessment and taxation of all property in that state, and for the levying of taxes upon the same according to its true value in money. This was in accordance with the mandate of the new Constitution of 1851. This act made it the duty of the president and cashier of every bank and banking company then or thereafter incorporated in Ohio, and authorized to issue circulating notes, annually to return on oath, under penalty, a written statement of its loans, discounts and investments, and imposed a tax thereon for the same purposes and to the same extent as personal property was or might be taxed at the place where such bank or banking company was situated. A tax was assessed under this act upon the Commercial Branch Bank of Cleveland, one of the banks organized under the act of 1845, and, its directors refusing to contest the same, one of its stockholders, not a citizen of Ohio, brought suit to enjoin the collection thereof in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Ohio. A permanent injunction having been decreed, an appeal was taken to the United States Supreme Court. After disposing of the preliminary questions concerning the jurisdiction of the court below to entertain the cause and grant the relief

Article 2 of the articles of consolidation is as follows: "The corporate name of the said consolidated company shall be the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Company." Articles 4 to 8, inclusive, are as follows: "Art. 4. Every holder of the stock of either of the said companies now outstanding shall be entitled to cast one vote for each share of stock held by him, in the stockholder's meetings of the consolidated company, which vote may be cast either in person or by proxy, and shall have all the rights of a stockholder of the consolidated company, as fully as if new shares of the consolidated company had been issued and exchanged therefor; and, in case the consolidated company shall determine to issue new shares, such shares shall be exchangeable at par for the now outstanding shares of each of the constituent companies; and the remainder of the capital stock of the consolidated com-sought and the right of a nonresident stockholder to maintain under the circumstances disclosed by the record such a suit, adversely to the contentions of the state, the court proceeded to the merits. It was admitted that the only difference between the Piqua Branch Bank Case and this case, granting that the complainant was rectus in curia, was that the former involved a tax assessed under a statute of 1851 enacted when the Ohio Constitution of 1802 was in force, while the latter was concerned with a tax levied under an act of 1852 passed after such Constitution had been amended in 1851. The two acts were the same in effect, and both were challenged as impairing the same statutory contract, viz., § 60 of the act of 1845. These laws were intended to tax, not the profits, but the business, capital, circulation, credits, and dues of the banks. They professed an intention to equalize the tax to be paid by the banks with that required to be paid upon personal property in general. The court said they did not accomplish this result, as they really subjected the banks to a much higher rate of taxation but this circumstance was not material in the view taken of the obligatory force of the contract statute. That contract was declared to be so plain and clear that no critical examination of § 60 could make its words more exact in meaning. The words, "would otherwise be subject," contained therein, relate to the legislative power to tax, and the section was a relinquishment of that power, binding upon the legislature which enacted it, and upon succeeding legislatures as a contract not to tax the banks during their continuance more than 6 per cent upon their semiannual profits. "A change of constitution," it was declared, "cannot release a state from contracts made under a constitution which permits them to be made. The inquiry is, Is the contract permitted by the existing Constitution? If so, and that cannot be denied in this case, the sovereignty which ratified it in 1802 was the same sovereignty which made the Constitution of 1851, neither having more power than the other to impair a contract made by the state legislature with individuals. The moral obligations never die. If broken by states and nations, though the terms of reproach are not the same with which we are accustomed to designate the faithlessness of individuals, the violation of justice is not the less." The conclusion was that: This case is coincident with that of Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369, 14 L. ed. 977, decided by this court in the year 1853. It rules this in every particular:

pany shall be issued from time to time, and upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the board of directors of said company. Art. 5. All and singular, the rights, powers, privileges, immunities, and franchises, and all the railroads, real and personal estate, easements, fixtures, equipments, choses in action, and property and assets of every kind, nature, or description, belonging to either of the parties hereto, shall be vested in, and become the property of, the said consolidated company, without any further act, deed, conveyance, or assurance being required in the premises. Art. 6. The affairs of the consolidated company shall be managed by a board of directors, which shall consist of such a number of members, not less than five, as the company may determine from time to time, each of whom shall be a stockholder, and one of them a resident of the state of Mississippi, one of Tennessee, and one of Louisiana. The members shall be divided into three equal classes, as nearly as practicable. Successors for the term of three years shall be chosen for those belonging to the first class at the first annual meeting of the stockholders held after this consolidation shall have been effected, for those who belong to the second class at the next annual meeting, and for those belonging to the third class at the next succeeding annual meeting of the stockholders. Each director successively chosen shall continue in office until his successor is elected. Vacancies in the board caused otherwise than by expiration of term for which the retiring director was chosen may be filled by a vote of a majority of the directors remaining, such appointee to continue in office until the next regular election of directors by the stockholders. The first board of directors shall be composed of the following and to the opinion then given we have nothing to add, nor anything to take away. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331, 15 L. ed. 401, Affirming McLean, 142, Fed. Cas. No. 18,032.

The same dissents were filed, the views of the nonconcurring judges being formulated by Campbell, J.

At the same term, in April, 1856, the court for the same reasons and on similar facts reversed the Ohio supreme court in two other cases upon the authority of that last cited. Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Debolt, 18 How. 380, 15 L. ed. 458; Mechanics' & T. Bank v. Thomas, 18 How. 384, 15 L. ed. 460.

The Ohio supreme court began to acquiesce. At the December term, 1856, in the cases of Matheny v. Golden, 5 Ohio St. 361, and Kumler v. Traber, 5 Ohio St. 442, Bartley, Ch. J., dissenting, it held that the charters of two universities incorporated under the old Constitution created valid contracts for tax exemptions, and in State ex rel. Morgan v. Moore, 5 Ohio St. 444, it denied, with two dissents, the motion of the attorney general at the instance of the state auditor, for a mandamus to the Athens county auditor to assess and tax the Athens Branch Bank under the act of 1852. It based the denial upon the ground that the United States Supreme Court had held that the act of 1845, § 60, constituted an irrevocable contract with the banks, and that the tax act of 1852 was void for impairing it, and that this ruling must prevail. It made the like decision in an action for trespass in enforcing such a tax, in Ross County Bank v. Lewis, 5 Ohio St. 447, and it granted, again against the protest of the chief justice in an elaborate opinion, the motion to enter the mandate of reversal in Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoup, 6 Ohio St. 342.

But the Ohio supreme court had not been converted. A year later, it again decided that § 60 of the act of 1845 did not constitute an irrevocable contract with the banks organized under that law, and that the subsequent act to tax banks and bank and other stocks the same as other property was then taxable in the state was a valid act and not in conflict with the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. An additional ground for this decision was found in the Ohio law of March 7, 1842, a general statute, unrepealed when the act of 1845 was passed, which provided that all subsequent acts of incorporation should be subject to amendment or repeal in the discretion of the legislature. I am aware, said one of the judges who concurred in this decision, that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided the question here pending adversely to the views I have expressed. In those cases I have bowed in submission to the mandates of that court, and have concurred in ordering them to be entered on our journals. But these decisions are understood to have been made by a bare majority of that court and, as its reasoning has failed to satisfy my judgment, I am desirous that it should have an opportunity to reconsider them. Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbur, 7 Ohio St. 481.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania was at this time in full accord with its neighbor in Ohio. In 1858 it decided that one legislature has no power to barter away the sovereign right of taxation so as to bind a future legislature.

In that case, Lewis, Ch. J., argued thus: In general, the state courts have avoided expressing an opinion on this momentous question where the necessities of the case did not require it. The cases which have arisen have generally been disposed of by holding that exemptions are binding until repealed by subsequent legislation; that no charter or grant carries with it such exemption unless clearly expressed; that the taxing power is of vital importance, and is essential to the existence of the government; that it resides in a government as a part of itself; and that the release of power is never to be assumed. But the question has been distinctly decided against the existence of any such power, five different times, by the unanimous judgment of all the judges of the supreme court of Ohio. It is true that the Supreme Court of the United States has taken a different view of that question, and has in several cases reversed the decisions of the supreme court of Ohio. We have no hesitation in adopting the decisions of the state courts on all questions respecting the meaning of their own state Constitutions, and the extent of the powers which the people of the states have therein granted to the different departments of their own state governments. It may be added that the United States Supreme Court was divided in opinion on this question, three eminent judges of that court dissenting, while the state court was unanimous. And it is but just to say that the opinion of the state court is sustained by a course of argument which has never been satisfactorily answered in the United States Court or elsewhere. Mott v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 9, 72 Am. Dec. 664.

Once again, in 1859, the supreme court of Ohio sustained a tax imposed under the law of 1852 upon one of the banks organized under the members, divided into three classes, as follows: First class: Stuyvesant Fish, Adolph Schreiber, W. C. Craig, Chas. A. Peabody, Jr. Second class: John W. Auchinloss, Walther Luttgen, Edward H. Harriman, J. T. Harahan. Third class: S. V. R. Cruger, R. P. Neeley, R. C. Shepherd, John C. Welling. Art. 7. The board of directors of said consolidated company shall choose one of their number president, whose term of office shall be one year, or until his successor shall be chosen or qualified. They may also appoint such other officers and agents as they may deem necessary from time to time, and prescribe their duties and compensation, and may provide, by the by-laws to be adopted, such rules and regulations relating to the affairs and business of said company as may be necessary or proper. The said board shall also have power to appoint an executive committee, of whom the president shall be one ex officio, who shall possess and exercise all the powers and duties of the board of directors, when the board is not in session. Until otherwise ordered, the corporate seal of the said consolidated company shall be that of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company. Art. 8. The said consolidated company shall be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered, in such a manner and upon such conditions as are permitted by law, to issue its bonds, and secure the same, as well as all bonds heretofore issued by either of the constituent companies, or that have been heretofore or may be hereafter issued by any other railroad company, by mortgage or deed of trust upon all or any of its railroads, rights, franchises, and property, real and personal, wherever the same may be situated, and whether banking act of 1845. It reiterated that § 60 of the bank act did not create a contract within the meaning of the Federal Constitution prohibiting the passage of laws impairing contract obligations, and in plain terms refused to follow the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in point, and reaffirmed and followed its own decision, contra, in Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbor, 7 Ohio St. 481, with two of its five judges dissenting. Skelly v. Jefferson Branch of State Bank, 9 Ohio St. 608.

When this cause was reached in the United States Supreme Court, in March, 1862, the learned attorney general of Ohio admitted in his argument that the Piqua Branch Bank Case had decided the precise point upon which the case at bar turned, to wit, that § 60 of the bank act of 1845 constituted an irrepealable contract and, as such, was protected by the Federal Constitution, although by a bare majority of the court. But he urged the court to overrule that decision for three reasons, because: 1. The question was one of the construction of the Constitution and laws of Ohio, and the construction adopted by the supreme court of that state was conclusive. 2. The Ohio legislature lacked the power, under the state Constitution of 1802, to exempt property from taxation irrevocably. 3. When the act of 1845 was passed a general statute of Ohio was in force making all corporate charters subject to alteration, suspension, and repeal, and the act of 1845 was subject to its terms. And he closed by inviting the court to consider with care the reasoning of Sutliff and Brinkerhoff, JJ., in Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbor, 7 Ohio St. 482, and that of Gholson, J., in the case at bar. Mr. Justice Wayne answered for the court, first, that the rule respecting the binding quality of the construction of a state court of its own Constitution and laws was always subject to the exception of this identical case; second, that the court had over and over again decided in favor of the legislative power to contract for an exemption from taxation, and had three different times decided that the act here involved did constitute an inviolable contract between the state of Ohio and the banks, and that, while the reasoning of the Ohio supreme court had received respectful consideration, it was in the later decisions merely reproduced as the foundation of its judgments without other illustration than it had when first it was reviewed. The third point made by the attorney general was left unnoticed. The court evidently considered that the legislature of 1845 had chosen to make an irrepealable contract in spite of the statute of 60 L. R. A.

three years before. Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436, 17 L. ed. 173.

The case decided with it and reported next after it, involving the same questions, was disposed of as follows: We affirm, again, the unconstitutionality of the law of Ohio under which the tax was assessed and levied, and direct the reversal of the judgment of the supreme court of the state of Ohio now before us by a writ of error. Franklin Branch Bank v. Ohio, 1 Black, 474, 17 L. ed. 180.

b. When contracts do not arise.

It was settled by the decision in Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 939, that the mere grant of a corporate charter lays no obligation upon the state to refrain from taxing the franchise, the capital, the stock, or the property of the grantee. The charter is a contract, but is not a contract which exempts its holder from taxation to any extent whatever, unless it contains in clear and unmistakable language an express surrender of the taxing power. If such a surrender is not found in words in the charter, it has not been made, cannot be implied, and an exemption does not exist. It is altogether unnecessary that the right to tax should be explicitly reserved.

A state, having gratuitously granted a bank charter with no express reservation in it of power to tax the franchise, may, none the less, afterwards impose a percentage tax upon its paid-in capital, payable when it declares dividends, without thereby coming in conflict with the contract clause in the Constitution of the Union. Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252.

Unless the right to tax a railroad corporation has been expressly relinquished, the state which chartered it may at any time lawfully impose taxes of any kind upon it. The argument that, as the power to tax is a power to tax so onerously as to destroy by laying burdens too grievous to be borne, and hence such power is inconsistent with the grant of a corporate charter, that, being a contract which may not be impaired, therefore, by necessary implication the taxing power is surrendered, is without force or merit. People v. Detroit & P. R. Co. 1 Mich. 458.

An exemption from a state license tax imposed upon a corporation cannot be implied because to tax a company for the privilege granted by its charter is to destroy that privilege. The corporation took its charter subject to the same right of taxation in the state that applies to all other privileges and all other property.

the same may be owned by said company at the time this consolidation is effected, or may be hereafter acquired, and may also exercise any and every other corporate right or power now vested in, or which might have been heretofore lawfully exercised by, either of said constituent companies."

It will be seen that said article 5 itself conveys all the property, rights, and franchises, etc., belonging to either constituent, to the consolidated company, without any further act, "deed, conveyance, or assurance being required in the premises," and in this regard is substantially identical with the provisions in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 475, 28 L. ed. 1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529, and Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, both of which cases hold that a new corporation was created. It will be noticed, also, that article 6 creates a new organization, and actually names a new set of directors for the consolidated company, who are, under article 7, to elect officers for the consolidated company. It will be noticed that article 8 authorizes the new consolidated company to "issue its bonds, and secure the same, as well as all bonds heretofore issued by either of the constituent companies," and further provides "that the consolidated company shall exercise any and every other corporate right or power now vested in, or which might have been heretofore lawfully exercised by, either of said constituent companies," clearly drawing the distinction between the two previous constituent companies and the new consolidated company; and it will further be specially noticed (and to this we direct the closest attention) that article 4 provides "that every

The mere grant to a street railway company of a franchise to lay its tracks and operate its road in city streets without consideration or agreement of exemption does not relieve the grantee from a license tax upon the business of operating a street railway. The exaction of such a tax impairs no contract. New Orleans v. New Orleans City & L. R. Co. 40 La. Ann. 587, 4 So. 512.

If it were permissible to abridge the legislative power of taxation by implication without a positive enactment clearly expressive of an intention to exempt a corporation from ordinary taxation, such an inference cannot be drawn from a reservation in the charter of a right to require subsequently what might have been required at the outset, namely, the payment of a bonus for the corporate franchise. State, Trenton Water Power Co., Prosecutors, v. Parker, 32 N. J. L. 426.

No property is beyond the reach of the taxing power of the state unless put beyond it designedly by an unequivocal sovereign act. Hence, a certificate of sale of state lands containing no stipulation or promise that the land or the vendee's interest in it shall not be taxed, issued pursuant to a statute equally silent upon the subject, does not warrant the exemption of such lands from taxation pending the final delivery of the patent upon the theory that the purchaser is entitled to a conveyance upon the sole condition that he pays the purchase money, and that any addition by way of tax impairs the obligation of the contract of sale. Robertson v. State Land Office, 44 Mich. 274, 6 N. W. 639.

A lease by the county authorities of public property, silent upon the subject of taxation, does not exempt the lessee from county taxation upon his interest in such property, although such lease contains general covenants for quiet enjoyment, peaceable possession, and against all claims and encumbrances. Luttrell v. Knox County, 89 Tenn. 253, 14 S. W. 802.

Of course, the state must be constitutionally competent to make a contract for exemption from taxation.

When a state legislature lacks constitutional power to extend an exemption from taxation to a railroad company beyond the period granted in its charter, which antedated the inhibitory Constitution, a statute professing thus to contract with the company does not confer the immunity it was its purpose to grant, 60 L. R. A.

since such statute is void. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091.

Then, too, as in all cases, there must be a consideration moving to the state, or from the corporation, to support a contract for exemption from taxation.

A statute exempting from taxation all the real property, including ground rents, belonging and payable at the time of its enactment to a certain hospital in a named city, so long as these continue to belong to such hospital, but which imposes no duty upon the institution in consideration of the grant, which requires the hospital to do nothing, but leaves it to pursue its own course as freely as before, contains nothing that savors of contract, and the legislature has the undoubted right to repeal the act whenever the public exigencies so require. Christ Church Hospital v. Philadelphia County, 24 Pa. 229, Affirmed in 24 How. 300, 16 L. ed. 602.

A grant of tax immunity, unless it rests in a consideration and is made under circumstances amounting to a contract, is a mere legislative gratuity, revocable at pleasure. Baltimore City Appeal Tax Court v. Regents of University, 50 Md. 457.

It is competent for the legislature to contract for the relinquishment of taxation; but where there is no consideration for such a contract the grant of exemption is a mere gratuity which the legislature may revoke at will. Baltimore City Appeal Tax Court v. Grand Lodge of Ancient F. & A. M., 50 Md. 421.

A provision in a corporate charter exempting the corporate property from all taxation, standing naked and alone, without any consideration to support it, either by benefits accruing to the public or obligations cast upon the corporation, is a mere legislative gratuity, revocable at any time, and not an irrevocable contract. Washington University v. Rouse, 42 Mo. 308.

The proposition cannot be gainsaid, although the exemption in the charter of this university was declared by the United States Supreme Court to constitute an irrevocable contract. Vide the case between the same parties, in 8 Wall. 439, 19 L. ed. 498.

A statute enacting that all companies or corporations formed to bore for and make salt in the state, and all individuals engaged in salt manufacture, shall be entitled to the benefits thereof, which are, first, the exemption from taxation, for any purpose, of all real and personal estate used for making salt, and second, the payment of a state bounty for each bushel holder of the stock of either of the said companies now outstanding shall be entitled to cast one vote for each share of stock held by him, in stockholders' meetings of the consolidated company, and shall have all the rights of a stockholder of the consolidated company, as fully as if new shares of the consolidated company had been issued and exchanged therefor." Now, it is clearly admitted by both sides that the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company was dissolved, and became extinct. The Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company had 50,000 shares of stock. The Yazoo & Mississippi Valley had 6,000 shares of stock. And, if anything is certain, it is undoubted that it is a metaphysical and legal impossibility that a corporation with 6,000 shares of stock could absorb one with 50,000 shares, and allow 1 vote to each share. It is well said by counsel for the revenue agent: "The voting power of the latter is more than eight times that of the former, and it could absorb the former, and seven more like it; and no legislative declaration or judicial dictum could alter this fact, for it is founded in the nature of things. The deed of consolidation provides for the contingency, and says, whatever the effect, that consolidation shall stand and be effective. What is, then, effected? If the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company is extinguished, and the voting power of each share of stock is equal, and extends equally over all the property, rights, operations, and franchises of the consolidated company, you may put in what name, or call it what you may, but the actual result is a complete and perfect consolidation, with the combined vot-of salt so manufactured, does not create an irrepealable statutory contract with those accepting the act and investing capital in the enterprise upon the faith of it, but only a gratuitous offer of subsidy which the state may at any time subsequently recall. East Saginaw Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82, Affirmed in 13 Wall. 373, 20 L. ed. 611.

A naked provision in a state statute exempting lands of a railroad corporation from local taxation for a limited period, when no consideration moves from the company—when it is required to do and does nothing in return—is a mere gratuity, which the state may revoke, continue, or change at pleasure. The fact that one of the parties was a state, and the other a corporation, does not invest the arrangement with any higher character than, or differentiate it from, a similar transaction between individuals. Tucker v. Ferguson, 22 Wall. 527, 22 L. ed. 805.

When a grant is a mere gratuity from the state, without any element of contract in it, there can be no impairment of it by subsequent taxing laws. West Wisconsin R. Co. v. Trempealeau County, 93 U. S. 595, 598, 23 L. ed. 814, 815.

The court reaffirmed the last above-cited case, saying the points and arguments were strikingly similar and the facts substantially identical in both cases. We hold here, it said, as we held there, that the exemptions in question were gratuities offered by the state without any element of a contract. There was no assurance or intimation that they were intended to be irrevocable, or that the laws in question should not be at all times subject to modification or repeal in like manner as other legislation. The state asked for no promise from the company, and the company gave none. Each party was at liberty to take its own course. Neither party was, nor was intended to be, in any wise bound to the other. The state chose to continue the gratuity for a time, and then withdrew it. The state did what it had an unqualified right to do. Ibid.

The exaction by the state of a bonus for the franchise it grants does not per se prevent subsequent taxation of the corporation.

The Maryland court of appeals argues in one case, that the legislature, by exacting a bonus when it grants a franchise to a corporation, does not surrender its right to tax the corporate franchise in common with all other property in the state. It waved aside the argument that the power to tax at all was the power to tax so heavily as to make the franchise that had been paid for worthless, by saying that the constitutional bill of rights forbade the imposition of taxes which did not equally burden every species of property in the state ad valorem. A bonus exacted, or sum collected, by the state for granting a corporate franchise, is, it declared, a purchase price demanded for a right or privilege conveyed, and which the grantee is at liberty, if he deems the price too high, to refuse to pay and go without the franchise. It is in no sense a tax, which is an imposition by the sovereign that the subject cannot evade, and which, under a constitution so providing, must ever be proportional to the value of the taxpayer's property,—his just share of the public burden borne in common with other property owners. An arbitrary exaction as the price of a franchise bears no such proportion. Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531.

But this opinion is too broad. The views expressed are out of harmony with the case of Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 183, 11 L. ed. 529, holding that the corporate franchise is not taxable under such circumstances.

A bonus paid the state by a foreign corporation for authority to do business and hold real estate within such state does not prevent the legislature from subsequently imposing taxes upon its net earnings, or its capital stock measured by dividends, or upon stock and earnings. Com. v. Central Petroleum Co. 1 Pearson (Pa.) 386.

A grant to a foreign railroad corporation of a right of way through the state, the statute providing that as soon as the road is completed and operated to a named terminus the company shall pay into the state treasury annually $10,000 (any neglect or refusal to pay working a forfeiture of the right and privilege granted), and, in addition, that the stock of such company to an amount equal to the cost of constructing that part of its road that is within the state shall be subject to taxation by the state, in the same manner as other similar property is or may be subject; and containing no words expressive, either of a reservation of power to lay other and further taxes, or of a release therefrom, does not amount to a contract of exemption from subsequent increased taxation. A later general statute imposing upon all railroads traversing such state a tax upon freight carried does not impair any contract with such company. Erie R. Co. v. Com. 66 Pa. 84, 5 Am. Rep. 351; Erie R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 Wall. 492, 22 L. ed. 595.

ing power of both. One cannot absorb $8\frac{1}{2}$, but 1 and $8\frac{1}{2}$ can make $9\frac{1}{2}$ —a new number."

We have thus far been discussing two things,—the purpose of the legislature in authorizing the consolidation, and what was actually done in pursuance of that authority; and it is perfectly clear that what the legislature authorized, and what was actually created in fact in pursuance of that authorization, was consolidation of such character as resulted in the creation of a new company under the name of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company; that the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company with which we now deal is not the old Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, one of the constituent members, but is the new Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company,—a new consolidated company, taking its grant of corporate rights from date of said consolidation, October 24, 1892, some two years after the Constitution of 1890 went into effect. This leaves for solution on this branch of the case a single inquiry: Did § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 cut off the exemption claimed by the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company?—conceding now, for the purpose of argument, that it ever had any such exemption. That section is in the words following: Sec. 180. "All existing charters or grants of corporate franchise under which organizations have not in good faith taken place at the adoption of this Constitution shall be subject to the provisions of this article; and all such charters under which organizations shall not take place in good faith and business be commenced within one year from the adoption of this Constitution, shall thereafter have no

Ordinarily a contract does not arise out of a general statute relating to whole classes of corporations, and not an organization act. This topic, as remarked at the outset, is one apart from the present theme, but a few cases peculiarly in point have been noted.

A general act prescribing a particular rate of taxation in respect of corporations of a certain class, and which contains none of the elements of a contract, is not made a part of the charter of a subsequently organized company in such class by the idle ceremony of its directors' adopting a formal resolution accepting its provisions. A later statute, therefore, which imposes a higher tax, impairs no contract. Holly Springs Sav. & Ins. Co. v. Marshall County, 52 Miss. 281, 24 Am. Rep. 668.

A general law whereby all insurance companies authorized to do business under its terms are exempt from certain taxation by municipalities, and which forbids all companies from negotiating any contract of insurance until its provisions are complied with, and gives none an option to reject its application, creates no contract between a corporation complying with its terms and the state which enacted it. Hence, the state may subsequently make such company subject to municipal taxation without infringing the contract clause of the United States Constitution. Easton City v. Northampton County F. Ins. Co. 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 403.

The compliance by a foreign insurance company with a state law establishing an insurance department, in order that it may obtain a license to do business in the state, when the statute provides that it shall be unlawful for city, county, or municipality to impose or collect any license fee or tax upon insurance companies or their agents authorized to transact business under such act, creates no contract with such company, so as to render void for impairing its obligation a subsequent statute empowering a city wherein it establishes an agency to levy and collect, for general revenue purposes, an annual license tax on insurance companies and agencies, and to regulate the collection thereof, and a municipal ordinance passed in pursuance thereof. Ætna F. Ins. Co. v. Reading, 119 Pa. 417, 13 Atl. 451.

Several cases are illustrative of statutes coming short of constituting contracts for exemption from taxation.

A section of a corporate charter providing that as soon as the corporate works have advanced to a certain state toward completion a sworn statement of the cost and expenses of establishing them shall be furnished, and then it shall be lawful, at any time afterward, to levy a tax on the company, not exceeding a stated percentage on its subscribed and paid-in capital stock, does not amount to a contract restricting the state to the specified rate and subject of taxation, or entitle the corporation to an exemption from, or an abatement of, a tax imposed under a subsequently enacted statute for the assessment and taxation of all private corporations (with certain exceptions not inclusive), at the full amount of their capital stock and accumulated surplus, although such tax act also excepts those corporations which, by virtue of any contract in their charters or of other contracts with the state, are expressly exempted from taxation. State, Trenton Water Power Co., Prosecutors, v. Parker, 32 N. J. L. 426.

A section in a railroad charter making it the duty of the corporation at a designated time annually to pay the state a percentage tax on the cost of the road, with a proviso that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon said company, does not amount to a contract for commuted taxation. The proviso is merely a declaration that the legislature intended that the company should not, while subject to the percentage tax, be chargeable with any tax upon its real and personal estate under the general tax law, which, but for such proviso, with plausibility might be asserted. Little v. Bowers, 46 N. J. L. 300, Affirmed on opinion below in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

To the same effect is State, Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Clark, 53 N. J. L. 332, 21 Atl. 302.

A clause in the charter of a domestic corporation requiring it to pay into the state treasury a bonus of a stated per cent on its capital stock or any increase thereof in three annual instalments in lieu of any tax on dividends, and the payment thereof pursuant thereto, does not exonerate the company from liability under another statute laying a percentage tax upon net earnings of all companies and corporations not paying a dividend tax under existing laws. Jones & N. Mfg. Co. v. Com. 69 Pa. 137.

A street railway charter requiring the corporation to pay the municipality in which it operates the same license fee per car as at the time of its enactment is charged other street railroad companies in the same city constitutes no contract that such license fee shall not thereafter be increased. Union Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 83 Pa. 429.

validity; and every charter or grant of corporate franchise hereafter made shall have no validity, unless an organization shall take place thereunder and business be commenced within two years from the date of such charter or grant." It is too clear for argument that the "power to consolidate is the grant of a corporate franchise." 2 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. § 954, p. 903; Ashley v. Ryan, 153 U. S. 436-446, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 664, 38 L. ed. 773-778, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865. It is not a right, but a mere license, as heretofore shown. It takes effect, not as of the date of the charter, but as of the date of the deed of consolidation. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. A corporation can have no status or existence until organized. 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. p. 288. Unless, therefore, the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company had been organized at the date of the adoption of the Constitution, it is settled that it could not possibly have been legally entitled to an exemption at that time. Planters' F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 161 U. S. 193, 40 L. ed. 667, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466. A corporate franchise is the right to exist as a corporation. It is the franchise invested in the individual stockholders before a corporation is organized, authorizing them to form such corporation by organization. This is the precise corporate franchise meant by § 180 of the Constitution. There is an exact analogy between this corporate franchise authorizing individuals to organize themselves into a corporation, and the franchise authorizing constituent corporations and artificial persons to organize themselves into a consolidated company; and

A series of statutes pursuant to which railroad corporations were formed, consolidated, acquired franchises to operate, mortgaged their properties, franchises, rights, privileges, and immunities, all of which passed upon foreclosure to purchasers, who, on acquiring them, were authorized to organize as a new corporation and thereafter own and operate the road under the original franchises, do not constitute a contract in the sense that an after-enacted law exacting from corporations in general, incorporated under either general or special acts and having capital divided into shares, a state tax of a percentage of the authorized capital as a condition precedent to the exercise of any corporate franchise whatever, can be said to be invalid in application to such reorganizing purchasers under the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. People ex rel. Schurz v. Cook, 47 Hun, 467, Affirmed in 110 N. Y. 443, 18 N. E. 113, Affirmed in 148 U. S. 397, 37 L. ed. 498, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

A mere provision in a state statute authorizing the consolidation of a domestic with a foreign railroad corporation, that the company formed pursuant thereto should pay annually into the state treasury a percentage tax on its capital stock, without other language to show any legislative intent that such tax should be in lieu of other taxes, or that the consolidated company should be exempt from further taxation, does not constitute a contract with the state that the company shall not otherwise be taxed. Later legislation, therefore, taxing differently a new consolidated company formed by the union of the first with two others of adjoining states declared in the authorizing act entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of each of its constituents, held and enjoyed in virtue of its charter, does not conflict with the contract clause in the Federal Constitution. Delaware Railroad Tax, 18 Wall. 206, sub nom. Minot v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 21 L. ed. 888.

A municipal charter authorizing the municipality to tax all real and personal property in the city, to borrow money, and to issue bonds, does not constitute a contract between the city and the state. When the legislature, therefore, subsequently grants a railroad charter, and therein exempts from taxation all the railroad property, inclusive of land for tracks, stations, and other structures in such city, it cannot be said to have impaired any contract obligation to the municipality, in spite of the fact that the city has subscribed for sundry works of internal improvement to pay for which it 60 L. R. A.

has issued bonds, and has also incurred other expenses, all of which must be met with the proceeds of taxation. Richmond v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 604.

A clause in a bank charter requiring the bank annually to pay a state tax of a certain sum on each share of its subscribed for and paid-in capital stock, the first payment to be made a year after banking operations begin, does not constitute a contract that other or further taxes will not be imposed upon the bank or its stockholders. Hence, a later statute imposing a specific tax upon the profits or dividends upon money invested in stocks of any kind, or in shares of any incorporated or trading company, including bank dividends, is applicable to the stockholders in such bank when they receive dividends, and is not repugnant to the contract clause in the United States Constitution. State v. Petway, 55 N. C. (2 Jones Eq.) 396.

A statute increasing the amount of a privilege tax imposed upon every telegraph company operating a thousand or more miles of wire within the state for messages received, transmitted, and delivered within the state, not sent on government service, in lieu of all other except ad valorem property taxes, requires a company within its purview, and which has paid a tax at the old rate for the year in which such statute takes effect, to pay a proportionate part of the increase for the balance of that year, because a revenue tax act creates no contract between the state and the taxpayer that no additional tax of the same kind will be imposed in the same fiscal year. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Harris (Tenn. Ch. App.) 52 S. W. 748.

A state statute passed to prohibit the issue and circulation of bank notes of small denominations, and imposing a tax of 20 per cent upon the banks which emit and put in circulation such notes, with a proviso that a not greater tax than 5 per cent of the dividends shall be exacted of banks that expressly relinquish the right to issue and circulate small notes, creates no contract for limited taxation with the banks who surrender privileges to get the benefit of such proviso; and the state may, nevertheless, repeal the statute and tax otherwise. Ohio Life Ins. & T. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 418, 14 L. ed. 997.

A statute authorizing the establishment of a ferry, and providing that it shall be subject to the same taxes as at the time of its enactment were or afterwards might be imposed upon other ferries of the state, and under the

in the one case, as in the other, the result of the organization must be a new company. There are various other franchises which may belong to corporations, such as the right to be and operate a railroad after the corporation is organized, receive tolls, etc.; but this belongs to the corporation as an artificial person. It is clear, therefore, that the corporate franchise referred to in § 180 is the right to exist as a corporation. It is thoroughly settled by the United States Supreme Court that the effect of § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 was to cut off any exemption claimed, if it ever existed. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 475, 28 L. ed. 1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529; Krook & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 308, 38 L. ed. 454, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

Learned counsel for the railroad companies insist that under § 181 of the Constitution, and § 279 in the schedule of the Constitution, this exemption was continued. These sections are in these words: "Sec. 181. The property of all private corporations for pecuniary gain shall be taxed in the same way and to the same extent as the property of individuals, but the legislature may provide for the taxation of banks and banking capital, by taxing the shares according to the value thereof (augmented by the accumulations, surplus, and unpaid dividends), exclusive of real estate, which shall be taxed as other real estate. Exemptions from taxation to which corporations are legally entitled at the adoption of this Constitution, shall remain in full force and effect for the time of such exemptions as expressed in their respective charters or by general laws, unless sooner repealed by the legislature." Section 279 is as follows: "Sec.

same regulations and forfeitures, creates no contract between the state and the ferry company not to tax differently, and is no impediment to the imposition of any tax the state may see fit to lay or authorize. Wiggins Ferry Co. v. East St. Louis, 107 U. S. 365, 27 L. ed. 419, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 257.

A corporate charter containing no provision for exemption from taxation, and only a clause withdrawing the company from the operation of a general corporation law, confers no immunity from taxation, but merely protects the charter from alteration or repeal. St. Louis v. Boatmen's Ins. & T. Co. 47 Mo. 150.

No contract entitling a railroad to exemption from after-imposed lawful municipal license taxes arises out of city ordinances granting to it lands, rights of way, and concessions in respect of stocks and bonds to induce, and which do induce, the company to locate depots, workshops, and other buildings within the city limits. Los Angeles v. Southern P. R. Co. 67 Cal. 433, 7 Pac. 819.

VII. Reserved right to alter, amend, and repeal.

a. In charters.

In the famous Dartmouth College Case, Mr. Justice Story, in his concurring opinion, suggested that if a state legislature in granting a corporate charter should take pains to reserve the right to amend or repeal it, the after exercise of such right would accord with the provisions of the contract itself, and therefore could not be regarded as impairing its obligations. The states were quick to take advantage of this suggestion, and the practice speedily became general, to reserve such right in new charters. The very numerous cases in which this course was taken are not usually cited in this commentary, because of its limitation to questions of taxation only.

In the Pennsylvania College Cases, Clifford, J., remarked that cases often arise where the legislature, in passing an act of incorporation for a private purpose, either makes the duration of the charter conditional, or reserves to the state the power to alter, modify, or repeal the same at pleasure. Where such a provision is incorporated in the charter, he added, it is clear that it qualifies the grant, and that the subsequent exercise of that reserved power cannot be regarded as an act within the prohibition of the Constitution. 13 Wall. 190, 20 L. ed. 550. He repeated this, in substance, in Miller v. New York, 15 Wall. 478, 21 L. ed. 98.

Such a reservation in a corporate charter enables a legislature to impose at any time additional taxation upon the corporation, notwithstanding a provision in the charter for complete or partial tax exemption. State Board v. Central R. Co. 48 N. J. L. 146, 4 Atl. 578; Bath County v. Farmers' Bank, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 245, 39 S. W. 1115.

An irrepealable contract right to an exemption from, or to a limited, taxation, given in a corporate charter, does not exist when the charter itself and an act extending its term both are subject to amendment, alteration, and repeal at the will of the legislature. Louisville v. Bank of Louisville, 174 U. S. 439, 43 L. ed. 1039, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 753.

A railroad charter, subject by its terms to alteration, amendment, or repeal by the legislature, does not confer upon its possessor irrepealable immunity from taxation by a clause in it subjecting the corporation to an annual specific percentage charge upon the cost of its road so soon as the net proceeds thereof equal a stated percentage, and providing that no other tax shall be levied upon the company. Therefore, the subsequent passage by the legislature of a general tax law taxing the real estate of every private corporation except such as are exempt by virtue of an irrepealable charter or other contract with the state operates to bring such a corporation under its provisions, and to make taxable its real estate. State, Morris & E. R. Co., Prosecutors, v. Miller, 30 N. J. L. 368, 86 Am. Dec. 188.

While the proposition stated thus is in accord with the current of authority, the case cited must be read in the light of subsequent decisions respecting the irrepealable character of the exemption given to this particular railroad by the New Jersey laws. The state supreme court held that its tax immunity had been lawfully taken away (State, Morris & E. R. Co., Prosecutors, v. Railroad Taxation Commissioner, 37 N. J. L. 228), and the decision was affirmed in the state court of errors and appeals (38 N. J. L. 472), but was afterwards reversed, and the exemption secured by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352, and then the New Jersey courts bowed gracefully and changed their rulings in accordance with that of the United States Supreme Court. State Board v. Morris & E. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 193, 7 Atl. 826.

Notwithstanding, however, the legislature has expressly reserved in a railroad charter the right to alter, amend, or repeal it, in the ab-

279. All writs, actions, causes of actions, proceedings, prosecutions, and rights of individuals and bodies corporate, and of the state, and charters of incorporation shall continue; and all indictments which shall have been found, or which shall hereafter be found, and all prosecutions begun, or that may be begun, for any crime or offense committed before the adoption of this Constitution may be proceeded with and upon as if no change had taken place." This is a wholly mistaken view of these provisions of the Constitution. Section 181 preserves only such exemptions as corporations fully organized prior to the Constitution were legally entitled to at the adoption of the Constitution. Its meaning plainly was that, if corporations organized and existing at the date of the adoption of the Constitution should retain the precise corporate existence they then had, such exemptions as they legally had should continue while their corporate organizations remained as they were. It has nothing to do with the preservation of exemption to any corporation existing at the date of the adoption of the Constitution which ceased to retain its said precise corporate existence, and became consolidated with another corporation, thereby ceasing to exist. Section 279 meant the same thing, to wit, that charters of incorporation belonging to corporations at the date of the adoption of the Constitution were not in any way to be infringed by the Constitution, so long as such corporations retained their precise previous corporate organization. This, and this only, is the whole scope of the two sections. Their plain meaning is in harmony with the whole spirit of the chapter on corsence of any statute exercising such right, a clause in such charter exempting the railroad from taxation effectually protects it from taxation under a general statute subsequently enacted, especially when such statute contains expressions indicative of a purpose of the legislature not to include such company. Petersburg R. Co. v. Northampton County, 81 N. C. 487.

When a corporation is entitled by its charter to an exemption from taxation upon its stock, and subsequently that charter is amended so as to allow of an increase of capital, with a reserved power to the legislature to alter, amend, or repeal, and the change is accepted by the corporation, and the capital is increased as contemplated, the original capital remains exempt, and the increase becomes taxable under a later law that applies generally to all corporations of the same class. Nichols v. New Haven & N. Co. 42 Conn. 103. Phelps and Carpenter, JJ., dissented from this conclusion because they entertained the opinion that the reserved power of alteration nullified the exemption, and that the tax law was in legal effect an amendment.

It makes no difference whether a corporation is chartered by a special act, or under a general statute. A section in either, reserving the right of alteration, amendment, or repeal, has the same effect of preserving the unhampered power to tax.

A section in a tram railway act reserving to the legislature power to alter, amend, or repeal, but providing that any such action shall not operate to change the corporate rights of companies formed under it unless so stated in the amendatory statute, whether regarded as a statutory contract between the state and the corporations thereunder formed, or a stipulation respecting the method in which legislation affecting them shall be adopted while it remains in force, or as a legislative rule for construing subsequent acts, does not, left untouched by later legislation, affect the competency of the legislature to tax corporations so formed by a different standard and in a different way than that therein provided, since the measure and method of taxation are not corporate rights within the meaning of such section. Detroit City Street R. Co. v. Guthard, 51 Mich. 180, 16 N. W. 328.

b. In general statutes.

Another method employed to prevent the alienation of the taxing power by improvident legislation has been the enacting of statutes 60 L. R. A.

providing that all after-granted corporate charters shall be subject to change or revocation at the will of the legislature.

In the Pennsylvania College Cases, 13 Wall. 190, 20 L. ed. 550, and again in Miller v. New York, 15 Wall. 478, 21 L. ed. 98, Clifford, J., formulated the general rule as to the effect of such a piece of legislation by saying: Such a power, also,—that is, the power to alter, modify, or repeal an act of incorporation,—is frequently reserved to the state by a general law applicable to all acts of incorporation, or to certain classes of the same, as the case may be, in which case it is equally clear that the power may be exercised whenever it appears that the act of incorporation is one which falls within the reservation, and that the charter was granted subsequent to the passage of the general law, even though the charter contains no such condition, nor any allusion to such a reservation.

Charters, declared the United States Supreme Court about the same time, granted after the enactment of a general statute reserving the right to alter or repeal all corporate charters, must be understood as standing just as they would if that reservation had been embodied in each charter. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

The state of Massachusetts was one of those that adopted this method. The general statutes of that commonwealth (chap. 68, § 41) provided that every act of incorporation passed after the 11th day of March in the year 1831 should be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the legislature. This statute was afterwards successfully invoked to sustain the total repeal of a subsequently granted charter of incorporation. Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co. 105 U. S. 13, 28 L. ed. 961. The statute, said the Supreme Court of the United States in that case, having been the settled law of Massachusetts, and representing her policy on an important subject for nearly fifty years before the incorporation of the company whose charter was repealed, we cannot doubt the authority of the legislature of Massachusetts to repeal that charter.

South Carolina was another state that enacted such a statute, and the United States Supreme Court afterwards had occasion to consider its effect with respect of a charter contract for immunity from taxation. The Constitution of South Carolina, adopted in 1868, declared that the property of corporations then existing or thereafter created should be subject to taxation, except in certain cases not porations in the Constitution, and cannot be frittered or pared away by ingenuity or refinement. It was well said by Mr. Justice Brown in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S., at page 312, 38 L. ed., at page 455, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep., at page 596: "But the decisive answer to this objection is that the legislature had no power, in 1869, to extend to a new corporation created by the consolidation an exemption contained in an act passed in 1857, before the Constitution was adopted; and hence, that under the terms of this act we cannot hold that immunity from taxation passed as a franchise or privilege to the consolidated corporation. The construction claimed by the defendant would be directly in the teeth of the constitutional provision that no property shall be exempted from taxation. While, as heretofore observed, an exemption from taxation contained in a charter previously granted could not be taken away by this constitutional provision without the impairment of the obligation of a contract, it doubtless applies to all corporations thereafter formed either by original charter or by the consolidation of prior corporations under the act of 1869."

It is further clear that, if the different charters relied upon had expressly provided by the use of the word "immunity," or by direct declaration to that effect, that the alleged exemption of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas should pass into the consolidated company, § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 still cut off the exemption, since the Constitution is the paramount law of the land,—the consolidation having taken place some two years after its adoption. It is so expressly held in Louisville & N. E. Co. v.

necessary to be here noticed. Subsequent legislation was enacted in obedience to this mandate, and imposed taxes upon railroad property. The question was raised whether the act of December, 1855, amending the charter of the Northeastern Railroad Company, exempting its property from taxation, had ceased to be effective. The company was incorporated in 1851, and at that time a general law of the state passed ten years before was in existence, and provided that the charter of every corporation subsequently granted, and any renewal, amendment, or modification thereof should be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal by the legislature, unless the act granting the charter, or renewing, amending, or modifying it, in express terms excepted it from the operation of the law. The provisions of that law were held to constitute a condition upon which every corporate charter granted after its enactment was enjoyed, and upon which every amendment was made,—to be as operative and as much a part of the charter or of any supplement thereto as if incorporated therein. As both the charter and amendment to it of the Northeastern Railroad Company were without any saving clauses, the tax exemption vanished with the change in the Constitution, and the enactment of the railroad tax law in consequence. Tomlinson v. Jessup, 15 Wall. 454, 21 L. ed. 204. It is true, said the court in that case, that the charter of the company constituted a contract between it and the state, and that the amendment when accepted, formed a part of the contract from that date, and was of the same obligatory character. And it may be equally true that the exemption added greatly to the value of the stock of the company, and induced the plaintiff to purchase the shares held by him. The power reserved to the state by the law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract as it originally existed or as subsequently modified, or its entire revocation. The original corporators or subsequent stockholders took their interests with knowledge of the existence of the power and of the possibility of its exercise at any time in the discretion of the legislature. The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the state control over its contract with the corporators, which, without that provision, would be irrevocable, and protected from any means affecting its obligation. Then, with respect, in particular, of that part of the contract which related to taxation, the court added: Immunity from taxation, constituting in these cases a part of the contract with the government, is by the reservation of power, such as is contained in the law of 1841, subject to be revoked equally with any other provision of the charter whenever the legislature may deem it expedient for the public interests that the revocation shall be made. The reservation affects the entire relation between the state and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the state.

This South Carolina statute was afterwards said to have the effect to make every corporate charter subsequently granted, amended, or modified subject to repeal, amendment, or modification by the legislature, unless specially excepted from such legislative control in the act granting the charter, amendment, or modification,—a construction somewhat broader, and one giving the legislature a more extended control, than that adopted in the preceding case, but a construction to which a more careful examination of the language of the statute had led the court. The statute formed a part of new or amended charters as if originally embraced in them. It did not, of course, operate as a limitation upon the power of succeeding legislatures so as to control any repugnant legislation, but, so long as it remained unrepealed, subsequent legislation not antagonistic was ruled by it. Hoge v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 99 U. S. 348, 24 L. ed. 303.

A general statute of Ohio, enacted March 7, 1842, provided that all subsequent charters of incorporation should be subject to amendment and repeal at the discretion of the legislature. It stood unrepealed on the statute books at the time the banking act of 1845 was passed. The banking act contained no allusion to it whatever. Yet in but one of the Ohio bank tax cases—that of Sandusky City Bank v. Wilbor, 7 Ohio St. 481,—was it considered efficacious to prevent § 60 of the banking act from becoming an irrevocable contract, and as justifying the subsequent taxing act. In all the other cases it was practically ignored.

The weakness of a general law of reservation lies in the fact that any subsequent legislature may ignore it, and contract to the contrary in spite of it, if it chooses so to do. Such a statute has proved in some cases ineffectual to

Kentucky, 161 U. S. 695, 40 L. ed. 857, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 714, and Pearsall v. Great Northern R. Co. 161 U. S. 671, 40 L. ed. 846, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 705. And, in this view, it of course becomes immaterial whether the position of learned counsel for the railroad that the exemption passes by general law into the consolidated company without express declaration is correct or incorrect, though we understand the Supreme Court of the United States to have distinctly held that the sovereign right of taxation does not so pass unless there be either express declaration to that effect, or the use in statutes authorizing the consolidation of the word "immunity." And that court has distinctly held as "the later and best-considered view, sustained by the weight of authority," that the use of the word "franchise" or "privilege," or any other word than the word "immunity," is not sufficient to embrace an exemption from taxation. Phoenix F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 176, 40 L. ed. 661, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 304, 38 L. ed. 451, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608; Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sandford, 164 U. S. 586, 41 L. ed. 562, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 198; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Pendleton, 156 U. S. 667, 39 L. ed. 674, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 413; Picard v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 130 U. S. 640, 32 L. ed. 1052, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 27 L. ed. 922, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193; Home Ins. & T. Co. v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 161 U. S. 108, 40 L. ed. 669, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 476. On this very point Mr. Justice Peckham, in Phoenix F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 178, 40 L. ed. 661, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 472, says: "The inference is preserve to the state the power it aimed to save.

The state of New Jersey suffered in this respect. It enacted, in 1846, a general law reserving to the legislature power to alter and amend all subsequently granted charters. It was decided by the courts of that state that such statute was in legal effect incorporated in every corporate charter thereafter granted. That such charters by force of that statute all contained express provisions that they should be subject to alteration, suspension, or repeal, in the discretion of the legislature. State, Warren R. Co., Prosecutors, v. Person, 32 N. J. L. 134, 566.

But the statute proved worthless when the legislature afterwards ignored it, and made with the Morris & Essex Railroad Company, in defiance of it, what was finally decided to be an unchangeable contract for tax exemption. The state courts decided, as has already been mentioned, that such general statute warranted the state in taxing at a different and higher rate that railroad company from what had been provided in its charter and the acts supplementary thereto—that, as in the case last cited, the general statute became an integral part of such charter; but the United States Supreme Court disagreed with them, and held otherwise.

When a legislature makes a contract by statute with a corporation exempting it more or less from taxation without guarding the right to change, such contract may not subsequently be impaired by the imposition of other and greater taxes, notwithstanding a previous statute providing that all corporate charters granted after its enactment shall be subject to alteration, suspension, or repeal in the discretion of the legislature is in effect generally. New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352.

When, too, in an act supplementary to such a charter, it is declared that the supplemental act and the charter also may be amended or altered by the legislature, such declaration will not control or affect a further supplemental act passed by a subsequent legislature, which, in terms amounting to a statutory contract, makes a specific rate of taxation for such corporation in lieu of all other taxes, and in which there is reserved no power or right to alter or amend. Ibid.

The New Jersey courts have since, in two cases, adopted and applied this doctrine. State v. Heppenheimer, 58 N. J. L. 633, 32 L. R. A. 643, 34 Atl. 1061; Hancock v. Slinger Mfg. Co. 62 N. J. L. 289, 42 L. R. A. 852, 41 Atl. 846. 60 L. R. A.

But they also hold that it is not applicable to all cases. Although that statute (Act March 14, 1846, § 6) did not bind subsequent legislatures so that they could not grant irrevocable charters, it none the less did create a law furnishing a rule for determining whether or not any after-granted charter was intended to be irrevocable.

Tested by this rule, the act of February 26, 1847, chartering the Somerville & Easton Railroad Company, as amended by the supplement of March 17, 1854, of which § 8 enacted that it should be the duty of said company on a stated date annually to pay a state percentage tax upon the cost of its road as shown by its report of the previous year, with a proviso that no other tax or impost should be levied or assessed upon said company, did not make an irrevocable contract. Little v. Bowers, 46 N. J. L. 300, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

Applying the same test, a section in the charter of a street-car company incorporated in 1865, providing that as soon as the railroad was finished a verified statement of its cost, including all expenses, should be filed with the secretary of state, and annually afterwards a sworn statement of the proceeds and expenses of the road should be made to the legislature, and immediately thereafter a like state tax should be paid, with a proviso in similar terms for exemption from any other tax or impost, did not constitute an irrevocable contract. State, Newark & S. O. Horse Car R. Co. Prosecutor, v. Clark, 53 N. J. L. 332, 21 Atl. 302.

Maine enacted, in 1831, a general statute declaring that any subsequent act of incorporation should at all times thereafter be liable to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the legislature in the same manner as if an express provision to that effect was therein contained, unless there should be inserted in the act of incorporation an express limitation to the contrary.

This statute did not authorize an imposition of taxes upon a railroad corporation when in its charter the legislature had explicitly contracted not to add any new duty, liability, or obligation to those imposed at the outset. State v. Dexter & N. R. Co. 69 Me. 44.

But while it did not bind any subsequent legislature that chose to disregard it, that statute, so long as it remained unrepealed, did control subsequent legislation not repugnant to it, and such subsequent legislation must be construed and enforced in connection with it. It applied with equal force to a corporation sought to be drawn in favor of exemption if the legislature did not affirmatively grant the right to tax. We cannot assent to any such view, and we could come to no such conclusion from an examination of the general statutes cited by counsel. It is a complete overturning of the universal rule in regard to taxation. The power and the right to tax are always presumed, and the exemption is to be clearly granted. Mere silence is the same as a denial of exemption." Nothing certainly can be clearer than this. Indeed, the opinion of Mr. Justice Peckham in this case is so clear and forcible that we quote from it to adopt the following passages on this particular proposition: "In Wilson v. Gaines, 9 Baxt. 546, it was held by the supreme court of Tennessee that, as the state in its Constitution (Const. 1834, art. 11, § 7) used in the same connection all the words 'rights,' 'privileges,' 'immunities,' and 'exemption,' each of these words was to be given, in statutory interpretation, a meaning so limited as not to include anything expressed by the others, and that, when any one of them is found in a statute, the legislature must be conclusively presumed to have used it in its restricted sense. This decision of the Tennessee court tends very strongly to the idea that the words 'immunity' or 'exemption' would have been required to secure the exemption to a company in a case like this. It is true that this view was not assented to by this court as being the correct one in Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 139, 146, 29 L. ed. 833, 835, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, and it is simply cited for the purpose of showing what the Tennessee court did decide in regard to the meaning of its own Constitution in reference formed by a consolidating statute out of constituent companies holding irrepealable charters as to corporations created de novo. And it was potent to preserve the right of the state to tax a railroad corporation organized under a consolidation act containing no limitation upon the taxing power, although its constituent corporations enjoyed by state contracts special tax immunities. The general reservation statute became a part of the consolidation act. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 66 Me. 488; Maine C. R. Co. v. Maine, 96 U. S. 499, 24 L. ed. 836.

A railroad corporation coming into existence in Georgia after the enactment of the statutory Code of 1863 of that state, providing, inter alia (§ 1061), that artificial persons called corporations, the creatures of law, are, except so far as the law forbids, subject to be changed, modified, or destroyed at the will of their creator, and (§ 1082) that in all cases of private charters hereafter granted the state reserves the right to withdraw the franchise unless such right is expressly negated in the charter, may lawfully be subjected to taxation under an act taxing its property as other property in the state, notwithstanding it was born of the consolidation of pre-existing corporations possessed of tax immunities secured by charter contracts, when the consolidation act did not in terms perpetuate the immunity. Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 359, 25 L. ed. 185.

When, at the time a street railway company is incorporated, there is operative a general statute making the articles of incorporation, by-laws, rules, and regulations of all corporations thereafter formed or reorganized at all times subject to legislative control, and to alteration, abridgment, or annulment by statute, and providing that every franchise obtained, used, or enjoyed by any such corporation may be regulated, withheld, or conditioned whenever the general assembly shall deem necessary for the public good, the legislature is entitled to impose upon such company additional burdens in respect of special assessments for street improvements, notwithstanding a prior contractual municipal ordinance upon the faith of which capital was invested and the road constructed. Sioux City Street R. Co. v. Sioux City, 138 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 898, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 226.

In 1856 the state of Kentucky enacted a statute providing (§ 1) that all charters and grants of or to corporations, or amendments thereof, and all other statutes, should be subject to amendment or repeal at the will of the legislature, unless a contrary intent be therein plainly expressed, with a proviso that, whilst privileges and franchises so granted might be changed or repealed, no amendment or repeal should impair other rights previously vested; and (§ 3) that the provisions of such statute should apply only to charters and acts of incorporation to be thereafter granted, and the act should take effect from its passage. The Louisville Water Company was incorporated in 1854, before this statute was passed; the exemption from taxation it possessed was not granted until 1882, and the exempting act did not express any intention to waive the right to alter, amend, or repeal it. In 1886 the legislature amended the general revenue laws of the state, and made the company subject to taxation by general comprehensive inclusion, unless its exemption continued as a contract right beyond the power of the state to impair. It was decided that the exemption statute was subject to the provisions of the general act of 1856, and therefore the subsequent taxing of the company was valid. Louisville Water Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 55, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346.

The act of the Kentucky general assembly of May 1, 1886, authorizing the city of Covington to acquire lands, build reservoirs, pumping stations with all necessary machinery and appliances for a municipal waterworks, and to issue and sell interest-bearing bonds to meet the cost thereof; and providing that such reservoirs, machinery, pipes, mains, and appurtenances, with the land upon which they are situated, should be and remain forever exempt from state, county, and city taxes,—did not constitute an irrepealable contract between the city and the state for immunity from taxation because at the time of its enactment the general statute of 1856 was in force and became an integral part of the grant. Covington v. Kentucky, 173 U. S. 231, 43 L. ed. 679, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383.

Certain banks in Kentucky have vigorously contested their liability to taxation under the so-called Hewitt act, upon the ground that by earlier charter acts amounting to contracts they could not constitutionally be subjected to its provisions. At first they were successful. The Kentucky court of appeals twice held that they had irrepealable contracts which the state had no power to impair by subsequent taxing laws. Franklin County Ct. v. Deposit Bank, 87 Ky. 370, 9 S. W. 212; Com. v. Farmers' Bank, 97 Ky. 590, 31 S. W. 1013.

to this subject. That the legislature was, about the time in question, freely incorporating various companies, and granting them exemption from taxation with considerable liberality, is not a sufficient reason to induce this court to depart from the universal and well-established rule making a claim for exemption a matter to be proved beyond all doubt. The circumstance which we regard as very significant, and which has already been alluded to, consists in the omission of the word 'immunities' in the grant to plaintiff in error. That omission we attach great weight to, and the least that can be said of it is that it involves the question in doubt. It cannot be denied that the decisions of this court are somewhat involved in relation to this question of exemption. It is difficult in some cases to distinguish the language used in each so far that the different results arrived at by the court can be seen to be founded upon a real difference in the real meaning of such language. The question has sometimes arisen upon the consolidation of different companies, and sometimes upon a sale under a mortgage foreclosure. Among the former is the case of Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608, where, under the laws of Missouri (§ 4 of the act of March 2, 1869), there was a provision that the consolidated companies should be 'subject to all the liabilities and bound by all the obligations of the companies within this state,' and 'be entitled to the same franchises and privileges under the laws of this state as if the consolidation had not taken place.' The question was said to admit of doubt whether, under the name 'franchises and privileges' an immunity

But both these decisions were afterwards explicitly overruled, and the contrary decided in Deposit Bank v. Davless County, 102 Ky. 174, 44 L. R. A. 823, 39 S. W. 1030, and the overruling decision was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 630, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530.

That decision ran to this,—that where a bank charter provides for the payment of a specific tax in lieu of other taxation, or grants an exemption of some part of the corporate property from taxation, and in the same act the bank is expressly made subject to the terms and provisions of an earlier general law making all corporate charters subject to alteration, amendment, or repeal, at the will of the legislature, a change in the method or rate of taxation, or a discontinuance of the exemption by a later statute, in no wise impairs the obligation of the corporate contract. Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530; Deposit Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 662, 43 L. ed. 850, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 875.

The elementary rule, said White, J., for the majority in these cases, is, that if, at the time a corporation is chartered and given either a commutation or exemption from taxation, there exists a general statute reserving the legislative power to repeal, alter, or amend, the exemption or commutation from taxation may be revoked without impairing the obligations of the contract, because the reserved power deprives the contract of its irrevocable character, and submits it to legislative control. The foundation of this rule is that a general statute reserving the power to alter, repeal, or amend is by implication read into a subsequent charter, and prevents it from becoming irrevocable. Ibid.

As in these cases there was not alone a general act of this kind, but also one made by unambiguous language a part of the exemption act, a fortiori was the latter subject to change.

c. In constitutions.

When, instead of a statute, there is a provision in the Constitution of a state that all corporate charters shall be liable to alteration, amendment, or repeal by the legislature ad libitum, exemptions not antecedently granted may be withdrawn, and new taxes imposed at any time without infringing the contract clause of the Federal Constitution.

The effectiveness of such a constitutional provision was conceded by the United States 60 L. R. A.

Supreme Court in New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352, in holding a general statute to the same effect worthless when the legislature declined to respect it. The case before us, said the court through Miller, J., differs from those in which, by the Constitutions of some of the states this right to alter, amend, and repeal all laws creating corporate privileges becomes an inalienable legislative power. The power thus conferred cannot be limited or bargained away by any act of the legislature, because the power itself is beyond legislative control. The right asserted in this case to amend or repeal legislative grants to corporations, being itself but the expression of the will or purpose of the legislature for one particular session or term of the state of New Jersey, cannot bind any succeeding legislature which may choose to make a grant or a contract not subject to be altered or repealed.

The subsequent decisions of the court emphasize this distinction.

If, when a railroad is incorporated and vested by the act of incorporation with the property, franchises, rights, and privileges of an older company thereby dissolved and acquired under mortgage foreclosure by the incorporators, and these can be said to include an immunity or exemption from taxation granted to and enjoyed by the mortgagor company, there is in force a constitutional provision and a general statute of the incorporating state, whereby all corporate charters are subject to alteration and repeal by the legislature,—there is no impairment of the obligation of a contract by the enactment of a later statute taxing the road. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 176, 29 L. ed. 121, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813.

As the court afterwards said: This reservation of power to alter or revoke a grant of special privileges necessarily became a part of the charter of every corporation formed under the general statute providing for the formation of corporations. A legislative grant to a corporation of special privileges, if not forbidden by the Constitution, may be a contract; but where one of the conditions of the grant is that the legislature may alter or revoke it, a law altering or revoking, or which has the effect to alter or revoke, the exclusive character of such privileges cannot be regarded as one impairing the obligation of the contract. The corporation, by accepting the grant subject to the legislative power so reserved by the Constitution, must be held to have assented to such reservation. Hamilton Gaslight & Coke Co. v.

from taxation passed to the new company. Various cases are cited in the opinion, which was delivered by Mr. Justice Brown, showing the grounds taken by this court in such cases. In Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 176, 29 L. ed. 121, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813 (a foreclosure case), it decided that an immunity from taxation enjoyed by one railroad company did not pass to the purchaser under the foreclosure of a mortgage, although the act provided that the purchaser should forthwith become a corporation, 'and should succeed to all such franchises, rights, and privileges as would have been had by the original company but for such sale and conveyance.' The case followed that of Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 23 L. ed. 860 (also a foreclosure case), where it was held that the words 'franchises, rights, and privileges' did not necessarily include a grant of exemption or immunity from taxation. See also, to same effect, Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Railroad Comrs. 112 U. S. 609, sub nom. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. v. Berry, 28 L. ed. 837, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 299. The case of Picard v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 130 U. S. 637, 642, 32 L. ed. 1051, 1053, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 640, may also be referred to upon the point that exemption, although it might be granted, must be considered as a personal privilege, not extending beyond the immediate grantee unless otherwise so declared in express terms; and it was therein declared that such immunity would not pass merely by a conveyance of the property and franchises of a railroad company, although such company might itself hold property exempt from taxation. In that case Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said: 'It is true there are some

If at the time a railroad charter is granted the state Constitution provides that all corporate charters may be altered, amended, or repealed at discretion by the legislature, the provision becomes a part of the charter none the less when that instrument is silent on the subject, and any subsequent legislature that so wills may change or annul it. This right and power is wholly unaffected by the circumstance that there have been substituted new Constitutions in succession, each containing a like provision. State v. Northern C. R. Co. 44 Md. 131.

"It is elementary that where the Constitution of a state reserves the right to repeal, alter, or amend, all charters granted by the legislature are subject to such provision, and, therefore, are wanting in that attribute of irrevocability which is essential to bring them within the intentment of the clause of the Constitution of the United States protecting contracts from impairment. The cases supporting this doctrine are so numerous that they need not be cited." Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 255, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, Affirming 90 Md. 449, 45 Atl. 465.

It does not matter what is the form of a piece of legislation that confers a right upon a corporation. Although it is in terms a statutory contract, and not an amendment or alteration of a charter, if the latter is its nature and effect, and it so operates, it plainly falls within the constitutional reservation, and is not irrepealable. Ibid.

A statute empowering a municipality to levy, assess, and collect for city uses an annual business tax of a specified amount upon the average quarterly business of certain concerns, including banks and banking institutions, and a municipal ordinance passed pursuant thereto, taxing the average quarterly discount business of banks according to their periodical statement of discounted bills and notes, imposes, to some extent, at least, a tax upon the capital of the bank, since the capital is employed in discounting. But although it does this, and by provisions of statute law operative when the bank was incorporated, and which became parts of its charter, it was declared that the capital stock should not be subject to taxation save for state purposes, yet, such municipal tax statute and ordinance are saved from the constitutional objection that they impair the obligation of a contract, by the presence in the state Constitution at the time the bank was chartered of a provision reserving to the legislature power to revoke or annul all corporate charters whenever it deems them injurious to the citizens of the commonwealth, provided that in so doing no injustice is done to the corporations. Iron City Bank v. Pittsburgh, 87 Pa. 340.

If a charter provision for the payment by a street railway corporation of a specific municipal license fee per car operated can be said to amount to a contract, by implication, when there is no express language to that effect, not thereafter to increase such fee, still, an act of the legislature enlarging the charge does not impair the obligation of the contract, when at the time the road was chartered the state Constitution authorized the alteration, amendment, and repeal of all corporate charters. Union Pass. R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 83 Pa. 429.

Under a state Constitution reserving to the legislature the power to alter, amend, and repeal all corporate charters, a section of a general railway act, providing for the taxation of corporations formed under it by the payment annually of a percentage on their paid-in capital in lieu of all other taxes may be repealed, and a new statute, putting such corporations upon the same taxable footing with natural persons, and taxing them upon property ad valorem, may be enacted without thereby impairing any contract obligation, notwithstanding there is left unchanged in full effect another section of the general railway act that provides that no alteration, amendment, or repeal thereof shall operate to change the corporate rights of companies formed under it, unless specially named in the amendatory act. Detroit City Street R. Co. v. Guthard, 51 Mich. 180, 16 N. W. 328; Detroit v. Detroit City R. Co. 76 Mich. 421, 43 N. W. 447.

VIII. Interpretations.

a. Extent of exemptions.

1. In general.

A state having in the charter of a corporation made an unalterable contract in relation to taxation, it is, on occasion, a matter of no small difficulty to determine how far the taxing power has been surrendered. As stated at the outset, cases that merely involved a question as to whether or not a particular piece of property was exempt from taxation in virtue of a contract between the state and the owner are not treated in this note. The rule is that a general exemption of the property of a cor-cases where the term "privileges" has been held to include immunity from taxation, but that has generally been where other provisions of the act have given such meaning to it. The later, and, we think, the better, opinion is that, unless other provisions remove all doubt of the intention of the legislature to include an immunity in the term "franchise," it will not be so construed. It can have its full force by confining it to other grants to the corporation.' This language is referred to by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in the case of Wilmingon & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 146 U. S. 279, 36 L. ed. 972, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, where, at page 297, 146 U. S., page 979, 36 L. ed., and page 77, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. he says: 'We do not deny that an exemption from taxation may be construed as included in the word "privileges," if there are other provisions removing all doubt of the intention of the legislature in that respect;' citing the Picard Case.

"Looking at the other side, we find the case of Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244, 21 L. ed. 326, where there was a grant to a railroad company of 'all the rights, powers, and privileges' granted by the charter of another company, which exempted the property of such other company from taxation, and it was held that the property of the first company was thereby also exempted. Mr. Justice Hunt, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that 'a more important or more comprehensive privilege than a perpetual immunity from taxation can scarcely be imagined. It contains the essential idea of a peculiar benefit or advantage or special exemption from a burden falling upon others.' Again, in Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 139, 29 L. ed. 833, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, poration relieves only such property as is held for, and is necessary to the transaction of, the corporate business.

A. 92, and (2) div. V., subdiv. d, of the note on Taxation of corporate franchises in the United States, to the case of Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. v. Com. (Ky.) 57 L. R. A. 33, 45-48.

A general exemption from all kinds of taxation does not confer immunity against special assessments to defray the cost of local improvement. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Decatur, 147 U. S. 190, 37 L. ed. 132, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 293.

This case gives the reason for the rule and reviews several of the decisions that sustain it. The rule itself has commanded universal recognition. It was again laid down, and many authorities were cited to sustain it, in Ford v. Delta & P. Land Co. 164 U. S. 662, 41 L. ed. 590, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 230.

It was affirmed again in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Grand Rapids, 102 Mich. 374, 29 L. R. A. 195, 60 N. W. 767.

The most frequent applications of the rule have been made in cases of religious, charitable, educational, and other exempt corporations of that ilk that lie outside of the scope of this note.

What is covered by an exemption from taxation of a railroad right of way? The act of Congress of July 2, 1864 (13 U. S. Stat. at L. 305, chap. 217) granted (§ 2) a right of way through the public lands to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, for the construction of a railroad and telegraph to the extent of 200 feet wide on each side of the railroad where it may pass through the public domain, including all necessary ground for station buildings, workshops, depots, machine shops, switches, side tracks, turntables, and water stations; and provided that the right of way should be exempt from taxation within the territories of the United States. The supreme court of the territory of Montana, in 1884, held void an assessment in Custer county upon "20 miles of railroad and rolling stock" of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company because of this exemption. The court cited case after case to emphasize the difference between a private right of way used intermittently and without substantial interference with the rights of the owner of the soil, constituting a mere easement, and a railroad J. R. A.

road right of way amounting to a practical appropriation of the land for a continuous and exclusive use and such a permanent change of surface character as to constitute a virtual appropriation of the fee. Northern P. R. Co. v. Carland, 5 Mont. 146, 3 Pac. 134.

The act of Congress of July 27, 1866 (14 U. S. Stat. at L. 202, chap. 278), chartering the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, granted to that corporation, its successors and assigns, the like right of way, only not so wide by half, through the public lands in the territories of New Mexico and Arizona. The 2d section of the act, granting the right of way, and providing for its exemption from taxation, except in the matter of dimensions, was in identical language with the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The Arizona supreme court four years later decided that the exemption given to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company in such act did not extend to superstructures, buildings, improvements, etc., on the right of way and essential to the operations of the road. It held that an assessment upon culverts, bridges, grading, cross-ties, steel and iron rails, fish plates, bolts, and spikes, steam pumps, water tanks, section and round houses, coal chutes, side tracks, blacksmith shops, and telegraph line was a valid imposit. It was insisted, in behalf of the road, that the grant of a right of way was a grant of the real estate in fee, and that, as whatever was permanently annexed to the freehold became a part of the realty, the exemption of the right of way exempted all permanent structures upon it. No one, the court replied, can question that a right of way is an interest in realty, nor that culverts, bridges, switches, depots, etc., become a part of the realty. He who has title to the right of way has title to the superstructure. The latter would pass by grant, and be subject to the laws regulating the conveyance of real estate, including the statute of frauds. But does it follow that the exemption of the right of way exempts all appurtenances afterwards attached thereto? This is the question. The court distinguished the case just cited by saying that it rightly decided to be invalid an assessment of "20 miles of railroad and rolling stock," because such an assessment of necessity included the right of way, whatever its character, and the right of way, eo nomine, was certainly exempt. This, it said, was as far as the authority of that decision went, and the opinion expressed in the case as to the exemption of the superstructures on the right of way is simply dictum. Then, it was held that a right to have shares in its capital stock exempt from taxation within the state was conferred upon a railroad corporation by a state statute granting to it 'all the rights, powers, and privileges,' or granting it 'all the powers and privileges' conferred upon another corporation named, if the latter corporation possessed by law such right of exemption. The question in that case arose as to the meaning of certain statutes passed by the legislature of Tennessee, resulting in the consolidation of certain railroads therein mentioned. In the course of his opinion, Mr. Chief Justice Waite cites the case of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 376, 393, 13 L. ed. 461, 468, where Mr. Chief Justice Taney, speaking of a statute which authorized the union of two railroad companies and secured to the union company 'the property, rights, and privileges which that law or other laws conferred on them' (the separate companies or either of them), said that such language extended to the union company the exemption from taxation contained in the charter of one of the united companies. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, continuing, in his opinion said: 'As has already been seen, the word "privilege" in its ordinary meaning, when used in this connection, includes an exemption from taxation.' The decision of this last case should be confined to the peculiar language used in the various statutes therein cited, wherein, aside from the word 'privilege,' it may be argued that, considering all the language used in those statutes, the intention of the legislature to exempt the company named from taxation may fairly well be made out. The later cases of Picard v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 130 U. S. 637, 32

adverting to the well-settled doctrine that the ordinary grant of a right of way is a grant of an easement, and not of a fee, the court proceeds: How we are to conclude from these premises that the exemption of a right of way ex vi termini exempts from taxation the superstructure, we cannot see. It is a non sequitur. The principle is then invoked that taxation is the rule, exemption the exception; grants of exemption must be strictly construed,—must be limited to their barest terms, and all doubts must be resolved against the grant; and thereupon the opinion, upon this branch of the case, closes thus: It is urged with great force, skill, and ability that the grant of a right of way to a railway is sui generis, and is in fact a grant of the fee; and, if so, to exempt the fee so granted is to exempt the superstructure. It is said that the term "right of way" is used to describe the land granted,—that is, that these are words of description, rather than of tenure. We cannot concur with this view, and no authority can be found which so holds. We must conclude that the words are used in their common, well-known, and universally accepted legal meaning, and that it was a grant of an easement as defined by law. It was not a grant of the fee. Should the company see fit to change its line and abandon its present alignment at any point, the right of way so abandoned would revert to the grantor. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Lesueur (Ariz.) 1 L. R. A. 244, 19 Pac. 157.

It is contended, said the same court, soon afterwards, that, as the right of way of the railway company is exempt, that exemption carries with it the exemption of all the improvements attached thereto. That question has been disposed of, so far as this court is concerned, by the case just cited, and we adhere to the decision in that case. Atlantic & P. R. Co. v. Yavapai County (Ariz.) 21 Pac. 768.

A decade later, the Supreme Court of the United States had the same question before it upon the same charter, and without dissent reached a conclusion diametrically opposite. What is meant by the phrase "the right of way?" asks McKenna, J., opening the opinion of the court, and adds: A mere right of passage, says the appellant, while, per contra, the appellee contends that the fee was granted, or, if not granted, that such a tangible and corporeal property was granted that all that was attached to it became part of it and partook of its exemption from taxation. Admitting that the primary presumption is that the phrase in question was used in its technical sense, the 60 L. R. A.

learned justice says, first, that such presumption must yield to an opposing context, and to the otherwise indicated intent of Congress, and, second, that the technical meaning is not entirely restricted to the mere right of passage. As to the first point, he calls attention to the fact that the right of way granted was exactly measured as a physical thing,—not an abstract right. It was to be 200 feet wide, and carefully broadened to include grounds for superstructures indispensable to the railroad. As to the second point, he says that the phrase may mean one thing in a grant to a natural person for private purposes, and another thing in a grant to a railroad for public purposes,—may bear a meaning as different as respectively are the purposes, uses, and necessities. He quotes from Keener v. Union P. R. Co. 31 Fed. 128, Justice Brewer's remarks that the term "right of way" has a two-fold significance. It is sometimes used to mean the mere intangible right to cross,—a right of crossing, a right of way. It is often used otherwise, to indicate that strip which the railroad company appropriates for use and upon which it builds its roadbed. Also, from Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 44, 34 L. ed. 857, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243, those of Justice Blatchford to the same effect, and finds further support in the case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Roberts, 152 U. S. 114, 38 L. ed. 377, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 496, deciding that the grant to the Union Pacific Railroad Company of a right of way 200 feet wide conveyed the fee. He fortifies this by citing several decisions of state courts to the effect that a railroad right of way is much more than an easement, because it involves a continuous, permanent, and exclusive user of the land across which it runs, and concludes that the interest granted to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was real estate of a corporeal quality, and that the principles relating to real estate—one of which is the elementary one that whatever is erected thereon becomes a part of it,—apply. And, as the grant is free from ambiguity, the rule of strict construction does not come in play. New Mexico v. United States Trust Co. 172 U. S. 171, 43 L. ed. 407, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128. The necessary effect of this decision is to overrule the Arizona cases.

At the same time two other cases between the same parties were decided the same way upon supposedly the same state of facts (172 U. S. 180, 43 L. ed. 413, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128), but, upon a material difference in the facts in one of these cases being called to the attention of the court, a reargument of that case was

L. ed. 1051, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 640, and Wilmingtton & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 140 U. S. 279, 36 L. ed. 972, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, show that there must be other language than the mere word 'privilege,' or other provisions in the statute removing all doubt as to the intention of the legislature, before the exemption will be admitted. The case of Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Tennessee, 153 U. S. 486, 38 L. ed. 793, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 968, adds nothing to the discussion on either side. The particular point was not in that case, but it seems to be cited by counsel for plaintiffs in error for the purpose of showing what was the general condition of the state at the time of the adoption of the Constitution in 1834, and what was the policy of the state in regard to internal improvements which the Constitution declared ought to be encouraged. The incorporation of an insurance company would hardly come within the most liberal meaning of the term 'internal improvements.' If this were an original question, we should have no hesitation in holding that the plaintiff in error did not acquire the exemption from taxation claimed by it, and we think at the present time the weight of authority as well as the better opinion, is in favor of the same conclusion which we should otherwise reach."

It is impossible for us to add to the elegance, clearness, or force of this reasoning. It will be noted, too, that the court says that the case of Tennessee v. Whitcorth, 117 U. S. 139, 29 L. ed. 833, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, "must be confined to the peculiar language used in the various statutes therein cited, wherein, aside from the word 'privilege,' it may be argued that, considering all the language used in those statutes, the intention granted. After the reargument, the court decided that the exemption granted in the charter was an exemption only of the right of way granted by Congress through the public lands, and not an exemption of the entire right of way of the road. The rule of strict construction did apply in that case, and the tax assessed, so far as the right of way through lands acquired from private owners was concerned, was held a valid one. New Mexico v. United States Trust Co. 174 U. S. 545, 43 L. ed. 1079, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784.

A very similar question was decided by the supreme court of Alabama in November, 1900. The Montana, Arizona, and United States Supreme Court decisions, just referred to, were not cited or discussed, so far as the report shows, by either counsel or the court. The question in the case was whether, under the Alabama statutory scheme for assessing railroads by a state board, the local assessors were still entitled to assess as ordinary real estate necessary structures, such as passenger and water stations, freight houses, etc., built on the right of way. The jurisdiction of the state board was confined to assessing right of way, roadbed, main and side tracks, rolling stock, and supplies carried on cars for employees. The local assessors were empowered to assess the other real estate, fixtures, machinery, tools, and property of railroad companies in their respective localities as other property of like kinds owned by private citizens. It was held that, upon consideration of the context and policy of the statute, the legislature meant by right of way only the easement of the railroad in the lands over which it had a right of way not occupied by roadbed and sidings, and that the other structures on the right of way were assessable by the local assessors, and not by the state board. Nashville & D. R. Co. v. State, 129 Ala. 142, 30 So. 619. The case, of course, does no more than construe the Alabama statutes respecting railroad taxation.

An exemption of its property from taxation for a term of years, granted to a railroad corporation, does not extend to lands it has leased for 1,000 years at an annual rental equal to 5 per cent of the price paid by the lessor, with a covenant to pay, in addition, all taxes and charges on the land, although the lessor bought such land for the use of the railroad. Com. use of Greenup County v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 94 Ky. 16, 21 S. W. 342.

A provision in the charter of a railroad corporation for the payment of a percentage tax upon its capital stock, in consideration of which its property and effects, whether real, personal, or mixed, are to be exempt from all and every other charge or exaction by virtue of any law of the state, is a special privilege of the corporation itself, and does not extend to the property of other lines of railroad leased and operated by such company. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Grand Rapids, 102 Mich. 374, 20 L. R. A. 193, 60 N. W. 767.

A corporation exempted by its charter from paying dividend taxes, in consideration of paying a bonus into the state treasury, is liable when, after the enactment of a general statute for taxing the net earnings of corporations, it increases the amount of its capital stock, to the net earnings tax upon the increase; but it still remains exempt on the original capital. Com. v. Columbia Oil Co. 1 Pearson (Pa.) 377.

A corporate charter providing for the payment of a bonus to the commonwealth of a stated percentage on the capital stock in lieu of any tax on dividends does not exempt the company from taxation thereafter imposed upon its capital stock. Com. v. Jacobus & N. Mfg. Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 82.

A section in a corporate charter providing that the company shall be "taxable only on the proportion of dividends on its capital stock, and upon net earnings or income only in proportion to the amount actually carried by it within the state," does not exonerate it from paying a bonus upon an increase of its capital, exacted under a statute applying to all domestic corporations with certain noninclusive exceptions. International Nav. Co. v. Com. 104 Pa. 38.

Provisions in a railroad charter and land-grant statute, exempting from, or commuting the payment of, state taxes, do not limit the sovereign power to subject the corporation and its property to local taxation. State use of Pacific R. Co. v. Dulla, 48 Mo. 282.

A railroad company whose charter exempts its capital stock from all state and county taxes, and which has, by accepting a land grant from the state, only become bound to pay the state annually a sum equal to the amount of the state tax on other real and personal property of like value upon the actual cash value of all its property in specie, still retains an exemption from both state and county taxes upon its capital stock eo nomine, and, although subject to state taxes, is exempt from county taxes, no matter how designated, upon its tangible property in specie. A statute, therefore, subjecting to taxation for past years property which, although liable, has escaped paying of the legislature to exempt the company named from taxation may fairly well be made out." Tennessee v. Whitworth seems fairly to be shaken as authority by the later decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and whether it is sound or unsound cuts no figure in this case, since in that case no new constitution intervened. The material fact that in this case a new constitution does intervene, constitutes the decisive difference between this case and Tennessee v. Whitworth, and makes this case fall within the principle of Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 304, 38 L. ed. 451, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 475, 28 L. ed. 1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529. See also Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 223, 23 L. ed. 861; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 186, 29 L. ed. 124, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813. We therefore reach the conclusion that the consolidation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company resulted in the creation of a new corporation, the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, and, that consolidation having been effected October 24, 1892, some two years after the Constitution of 1890 went into effect, § 180 of that Constitution effectually cut off the exemption claimed. We entertain no doubt whatever of the entire correctness of this view, but, if the doubt existed, the same result must follow in accordance with the well-settled principle that all doubt must be resolved in favor of the taxing power. This principle has never been more emphatically declared than in Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Thomas, 132 U. S. 174, 33 L. ed. 302, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 68, in the following clear-taxes, does not make such railroad company liable for any county tax. State ex rel. Love v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 101 Mo. 120, 13 S. W. 406.

A provision in a corporate charter that the real and personal property of the company shall be subject to the same taxes, to be assessed and collected in the same way, that the real and personal property of individual citizens is assessed and taxed, and not otherwise, followed by the enactment of a later statute making a part of such charter an act to encourage manufactures, which declared that the state would exempt, for ten years, from taxation all such companies, does not relieve the corporation from taxation upon its capital stock in virtue of a later general statute aptly phrased for the purpose. State v. Simmons, 70 Miss. 485, 12 So. 477.

A bank charter providing that, in consideration of the cession to the state of valuable rights, or the payment, in lieu thereof, of $500,000, the corporation shall be exempt during its life from all taxes to the state, or to any parish or corporation created by the state, in its capital and property acquired by virtue of the act of incorporation; and which further provides that all profits of the bank shall be added to and made a part of the capital, except such part thereof as may remain at stated periods after the redemption of a series of outstanding bonds,—exempts everything which enters into and makes part of the bank's capital; and, by consequence, the accumulated profits held for bond redemption are exempt, when there is no excess for dividends to the stockholders. Citizens' Bank v. Bouny, 32 La. Ann. 239.

It does not, however, exempt the bank from paying taxes upon land acquired by it upon foreclosure of mortgages given to secure subscriptions to its stock, when the state Constitution prohibits corporations from taking and holding longer than ten years any real estate not necessary to their legitimate business, and the bank has become subject to such limitation by accepting an act of the legislature having such effect. State ex rel. Citizens' Bank v. Board of Assessors, 48 La. Ann. 35, 18 So. 753. Affirmed in 167 U. S. 407, 42 L. ed. 215, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1000.

Neither does such chartered immunity from taxation upon its capital excuse the bank from license taxes upon its occupation or business. A license tax upon the business of banking is no tax upon the capital employed therein. 60 L. R. A.

State v. Citizens' Bank, 52 La. Ann. 1086, 27 So. 709.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in affirming in part and in part reversing the circuit court for the eastern district of Louisiana, in the case of Citizens' Bank v. Orleans, 54 Fed. 73, decided that, under this charter, the bank (1) was exempt from state, municipal, and parochial taxes upon its capital stock, its banking house, and furniture acquired and used in its banking business; (2) could not be compelled to pay any tax assessed ex nomine upon its shareholders; and (3) was taxable upon real estate acquired by it under mortgage foreclosure. It declined to decide whether or not the stockholders were exempt from taxes on their shares if the bank was charged with no obligation to pay such taxes, but expressly left that question open to debate by the shareholders themselves in case the state later should impose such a tax. It also left open, without prejudice either to the public authorities or the bank, the question of the right of the state and city to lay a license tax upon the bank. New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 906.

A section in a railroad charter that the capital stock of the company shall be forever exempt from taxation, and the road with all its fixtures and appurtenances, including workshops, warehouses, and vehicles of transportation, shall be exempt from taxation for the period of twenty years from the completion of the road and no longer, makes the road and appurtenances, buildings, and rolling stock subject to taxation after the lapse of the twenty-year period, irrespective of the meaning given to the term "capital stock," and without regard to the fact that the capital stock has all been invested in the property of the railroad. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 3 Tenn. Ch. 604.

The property is taxable if the capital stock per se is exempt. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091.

A somewhat similar provision of exemption in another railroad charter was held not to confer exemption upon lands granted by Congress through the state to the company. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Loftin, 98 U. S. 559, 25 L. ed. 222.

This decision was followed in Memphis & St. L. R. Co. v. Loftin, 105 U. S. 258, 26 L. ed. 1042.

In the latter case the rule that all exemptions from taxation are to be strictly construed, and every doubt resolved in favor of the state, was applied in giving a construction to a law cut language: "Exemptions from taxation are regarded as in derogation of the sovereign authority and of common right, and therefore not to be extended beyond the exact and express requirements of the language used, construed strictissimi juris." It necessarily follows from these views that, on this ground alone, standing by itself, apart from all other considerations in this case, we must and do hold the railroad company not entitled to the exemption claimed except in the particular hereinafter to be mentioned, and this independent ground of decision disposes of the case regardless of all other grounds. It will be observed that we have, in reaching this conclusion, treated consolidation, not as in itself meaning necessarily that a new corporation must be created, but have allowed it the latitude of definition sometimes given it, very loosely and improperly, as we think, according to which "consolidation" may mean "merger," the absorption of one corporation by another. Taking the word even in that sense, as we have done thus far throughout this discussion, we have nevertheless found that the purpose of the legislature was such consolidation as meant, not merger, but the creation of a new corporation, and that the articles of consolidation, together with the action of the stockholders and directors of the two companies, show that what was actually effected was the creation of a new corporation. It is not necessary, therefore, to say that the term "consolidation" ex vi termini imports a creation of a new corporation, though, in our judgment, such is its true meaning, as shown by the best-considered cases. The loose phrase "consolidation by merger" is too vague and confusing to sig-declaring that swamp and overflowed lands should be exempted from taxation for the term of ten years, or until they were reclaimed. The contention, on the one side, was that the exemption continued for ten years absolutely and thereafter until reclamation, and, on the other, that it continued until reclamation only, and in no event beyond a decade. The latter contention was upheld, the more readily because the state court had so ruled over twenty years before.

The exaction by a municipality of a specific fixed sum as a bonus or privilege tax, payable annually, in ordinances granting to a street railway corporation the right to build and operate its line in designated streets and highways, does not bar the city from levying, nor exonerate the company from paying, an ad valorem municipal tax upon its franchise, despite the fact that in one or more of such ordinances the bonus was expressly called a franchise tax. The reason is that, without legislative authority, a city cannot grant an exemption from, nor contract to commute, taxes upon property legally assessable. Dallas v. Dallas Consol. Electric Street R. Co. (Tex.) 66 S. W. 886.

The company submitted in this case to a general ad valorem tax upon its tangible property. It contested a $2,865 tax on what was called its franchise to operate and maintain lines of street railway over certain streets. The ordinances granting the franchises required the company to carry policemen and firemen when on duty free of charge, and to pave and repair the streets it operated in (this cost $8,000 in two years, one of these the tax year), and to pay annually fixed sums, called in some instances a bonus, in others a franchise tax, and in others still left unnamed, amounting in all to over $2,600 a year. The court, while of the opinion that, in the absence of any express statement that these annual exactions were in lieu of ad valorem taxes upon any part of the property of the road, and that the language used evinced no clear purpose to create a contract of exemption there was no contract, really rested its decision on the ground that a city had no power to exempt or commute where the legislature had not expressly conferred it by statute.

The charter of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company provided that the road and all engines, etc., and all property and profits of the company, should be exempt from any public charge or tax whatsoever for the term of fifteen years, after which the legislature might impose a tax not exceeding 25 cents annually on each share of the capital stock held by individuals whenever the annual profits should exceed 8 per cent. The state court held that this did not constitute a contract preventing the taxation of the franchises, lands, and appurtenances and rolling stock of the company after fifteen years. In its view, the express reservation of a right to tax the shares after such time had elapsed did not by implication exclude the right to tax the property of the company. Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Reid, 64 N. C. 155.

The United States Supreme Court, however, reversed this decision (13 Wall. 269, 20 L. ed. 570) on the authority of the like case of Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

The state court afterwards followed these decisions. Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 89 N. C. 291, 45 Am. Rep. 679; Worth v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 89 N. C. 301.

A conditional exemption from taxation of the real estate of a railroad company, given in its charter, until its dividends of profits shall exceed 6 per cent per annum, is not satisfied, so as to authorize the imposition of taxes, by the payment during the Civil War of a larger dividend in confederate currency. Richmond & D. R. Co. N. C. Div. v. Brogden, 74 N. C. 707.

Nor is such condition satisfied by the payment of 6½ per cent per annum rental upon its capital stock by its lessee, when more than the fraction is consumed in paying interest and for other necessary expenses, and in creating and augmenting a sinking fund. Ibid.

But such an exemption does not exempt the corporate franchises from taxation. Ibid.

A railroad charter declaring that all machines, wagons, vehicles, and carriages purchased with the funds of the company, and all its works constructed by authority of the incorporating act, and all profits which shall accrue from the same, shall be vested in the respective shareholders, deemed personal estate, and exempt from any public charge or tax whatever, saves the corporation from liability to pay a tax upon its gross receipts, and also from a percentage tax upon the actual cash value of every share of its capital stock, and from a privilege tax in lieu thereof according to mileage imposed by a subsequent statute, because the later legislation is repugnant to the contract clause in the United States Constitution. Worth v. Petersburg R. Co. 89 N. C.

nify anything clearly. One might as well say "merger by consolidation," and that equivalency of phrase would give us the equation "consolidation = merger," which, manifestly, is nonsense. The term "consolidation" where such phrase as "consolidation by merger" occurs, has, as it seems to us, been carelessly confounded with the term "amalgamation" as used in England. Amalgamation, in the English sense, probably means about what merger does with us, but it is not consolidation in any proper sense of the term. It is in the interest of clearness of definition that consolidation should be limited to signify such union of two or more corporations as necessarily results in the creation of a third new corporation, and, as we understand the decisions, this is what is known as the American doctrine, and the better view. Thus, in Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, p. 631, Mr. Green says, summing up in a most learned note: "The term 'amalgamation' is seldom applied to corporations in this country. That which takes its place as much as any is 'consolidation.' But, though it is difficult accurately to define amalgamation as commonly used in English law, it certainly has a wider meaning than consolidation has with us. Consolidation would, e. g., be inapplicable to a union of two or more companies in such a way that one of the original corporations only was continued in existence, while the others were merged or absorbed in it. The absorption of one corporation by another would, according to some of the decisions, be an amalgamation in England; but it would not be a consolidation here. In Mo-Mahan v. Morrison, 16 Ind. 172, 79 Am. Dec. 418, a case frequently cited with ap-

301; Worth v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 89 N. C. 510.

The same court had occasion afterwards to consider once more the extent of the exemption given the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company, and, admitting the controlling authority of the case of that road against Reid (13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568), held that the exemption did not cover an additional road afterwards acquired as a branch line. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 110 N. C. 137, 14 S. E. 652.

In Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. 36, 22 L. ed. 282, and Bailey v. Maguire, 22 Wall. 215, 22 L. ed. 850, there were involved the exemptions of the Pacific Railroad Company under the Missouri act of December 25, 1852, § 12. The section provided in substance, that such road and the Southwestern Branch Railroad each should be exempt from taxation until it declared a dividend, when the roadbed, buildings, machinery, rolling stock, and other property of the completed road at the actual cash value thereof should be subject to taxation at the rate assessed by the state on other real and personal property of like value. To this end, it was made the duty of the president of the road, every 1st of February after it was finished and put in operation and had declared a dividend, to furnish the state auditor a sworn statement of the actual value of the roadbed, buildings, machinery, engines, cars, and other property pertaining to the completed road: the state auditor was thereupon to assess the road on the basis of such statement, and, if the company omitted to pay the tax assessed in thirty days, it was penalized at the rate of 10 per cent a month. The default of the president in making the statement subjected him to a penalty of $10,000. Both tax and penalties were recoverable in an ordinary action at law by the state. The section ended with a proviso that if either company should, for two years after completing its road and putting it in operation, fail to declare a dividend, the exemptions should cease. The first of these cases decided (Clifford and Miller, JJ., dissenting) that the section created a contract between the state and the railroad company exempting the road from taxation until it was completed and for two years afterwards if it did not sooner pay a dividend. The other case decided that it did not exempt the road from other than state taxes after the two years had expired; nor did it preclude the state from adopting a different method of valuation and assessment for state taxes.

Railroad Company granted by Missouri in 1849, contained a section (§ 49) declaring that every person who should cease to be a stockholder should also cease to be a member of said company, and the stock of said company should be exempt from all state and county taxes. This section was in the same language as one afterwards considered in State ex rel. Guffey v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. 89 Mo. 523, 14 S. W. 522, affirmed in 120 U. S. 569, 30 L. ed. 732, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, rehearing denied in 122 U. S. 561, 30 L. ed. 1135, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1300, and of which the state court said that it might be conceded to exempt, not only the stock of the corporation, but also the property it represented. By an act passed in 1852 this company was given the benefit of the congressional donation of public lands. The act was, in substance, the same as the statute involved in Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. 36, 22 L. ed. 282; Bailey v. Maguire, 22 Wall. 215, 22 L. ed. 850. The Missouri supreme court ruled, in respect of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, that the act of 1852, upon acceptance by the company, modified and replaced the charter provisions concerning taxation, and although less explicit than the Pacific Railroad acts, did, by necessary implication, exempt the capital stock from taxation, except in the manner and at the time therein specified. And it held that a subsequent act taxing all property owned by incorporated companies ever and above their capital stock did not warrant the taxing of the roadbed, depots, cars, and locomotives, and other real and personal property needful to operate the road, because all these were parts of the capital stock. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 30 Mo. 550.

The Missouri act of March 21, 1868, to aid in the building of branch railroads in the state, passed after the adoption of the Constitution of 1865 prohibiting the exemption from taxation of all except governmental and public-school property in the state, did not give to railroads built according to its provisions any exemption from taxation, although built by railroad corporations empowered originally to build branches and holding irrevocable charters containing exemption clauses granted before such Constitution, because such act did not contain any exemption, and, if it had, it would have been unconstitutional. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. v. Guffey, 120 U. S. 569, sub nom. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. v. Missouri ex rel. Guffey, 30 L. ed. 732, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 693, rehearing denied in 122 U. S. 561, 30 L. ed.

proval in the later decisions, it was said that the effect of the consolidation 'was a dissolution of the three corporations named, and, at the same instant, the creation of a new corporation, with property, liabilities, and stockholders, derived from those then passing out of existence.' Similarly, in State ex rel. Brown v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46, 79 Am. Dec. 405, consolidation is said to amount to 'a surrender of the old charters by the companies, the acceptance thereof by the legislature, and the formation of a new corporation out of such portions of the old as enter into the new.' . . . Where, by the terms of the statute and deed, the first corporation was extinguished, the second only continued in existence, this was held not to be 'an amalgamation or consolidation of the two corporations into one.' Powell v. North Missouri R. Co. 42 Mo. 63. . . . In the American view, therefore, it would seem that the dissolution of all the old corporations and the creation of one new one are, as a rule, involved in consolidation." Mr. Chief Justice Fuller in Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 146 U. S. 279, 36 L. ed. 972, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72, clearly has this view of consolidation. He says: "And although the transaction was described by the legislature, in the act of 1875, as a consolidation, it amounted rather to a merger, or an amalgamation, and need not be held to have resulted in a new corporation,"—clearly distinguishing between consolidation on the one hand and merger, or amalgamation, on the other hand as two things in their essential nature wholly different from each other, as undoubtedly they are. So the supreme court of Arkansas distinctly holds in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark., at page

The word "impost," in a corporate charter providing that on the corporation's investing and keeping invested $500,000 in real estate in the state its real and personal property outside of it and the stock held or owned in it by any of its stockholders shall not be liable to any tax or impost whatsoever, includes every kind of enforced contribution to the public treasury. State v. Heppenheimer, 58 N. J. L. 633, 32 L. R. A. 643, 34 Atl. 1061; Hancock v. Singer Mfg. Co. 62 N. J. L. 289, 42 L. R. A. 852, 41 Atl. 846.

Such a charter precludes the state's levying, after granting it, a franchise tax upon the capital of the corporation. Ibid.

A clause in an amended charter providing that the corporation shall be exempt from the payment of any state, county, or municipal tax or license for transacting business in the state gives the company immunity from all taxation, and not merely from license fees or privilege taxes for carrying on business. Bowling Green v. Kentucky Masonic Mut. L. Ins. Co. 5 Ky. L. Rep. 697.

A railroad charter declaring that the capital stock of the company and all other property belonging to or connected with the railroad shall be exempt from taxation until eight years after such road shall be put in operation prohibits the legislature from levying a tax designated as a privilege tax upon the corporation before the stated period expires. Grand Bluff & P. G. R. Co. v. Buck, 53 Miss. 246.

An exemption in a railroad charter of the company, its stock, its railroad and appurtenances, and all of its property in the state necessary or incidental to the full exercise of its chartered powers includes immunity from privilege as well as from ad valorem, taxes; and, under a state constitution, in force when the charter was granted, containing a section making the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit subject to taxation, the exemption falls for want of legislative power to grant any exemption; the immunity from privilege taxes falls with the loss of exemption from ad valorem taxes. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 66, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

Ad valorem taxation and privilege taxation are different matters having no necessary connection. The same person may be subject to both or to one and not the other. Subjection to one does not mean subjection to the other, nor does exemption from one include exemption from the other. Whether or not a corporation, conceded to be exempt from ad valorem taxes, is also exempt from privilege taxes, depends wholly upon the scope of the exemption clause. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 53 L. R. A. 921, 43 S. W. 115.

The case accordingly held that a contract in a railroad charter that the capital stock, the dividends thereon, the road, fixtures, depots, workshops, warehouses, and rolling stock of such corporation should be forever exempt from taxation, and that it should not be lawful for the state, or any political division thereof, to impose any tax upon such stock, dividends, property, or estate, except that, when the dividends should exceed legal interest, these might be taxed in common with and at the same rate as money at interest, provided the tax did not go so far as to reduce the dividends below the legal rate of interest,—exempted only such property as was particularly mentioned; hence, by omitting to name them, left open to ad valorem taxation the corporate franchise and surplus, if any, and, a fortiori, did not exempt from privilege taxation. Ibid.

This case was followed in Harkreader v. Lebanon & N. Turnp. Co. 101 Tenn. 680, 49 S. W. 751, which the court deemed identical in principle.

Under the operation of the principles heretofore mentioned (supra, III. a), a provision in a corporate charter, that, in consideration of certain property vesting in the state after a limited time, the stock of the corporation should be exempt from taxation by the state, or by any parish or body politic under its authority for the whole term of the charter, confers no immunity from the payment of a municipal license tax. New Orleans v. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. 32 La. Ann. 104.

A clause in a railroad charter exempting the capital stock forever, and the road with all its fixtures and appurtenances, including workshops, warehouses, and vehicles for transportation, for twenty years, from taxation, confers no exemption of the franchise, which is a distinct species of property, not included. Atlantic, T. & O. R. Co. v. Mecklenberg County, 87 N. C. 129.

A municipal ordinance, providing that, in consideration of a reduction of fares by a street railway line, and the substitution of electric for horse traction, the company is released from any and all obligations to keep in repair any part of the streets occupied by its tracks in the municipality; from the payment of car licenses, except as specifically stated; and from the payment of taxes of any and every kind upon its real estate and personal property,— 518, afterwards affirmed by the United States Supreme Court (113 U. S. 465, 28 L. ed. 1055, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529), saying: "And, in the absence of a contrary intention, clearly expressed in the law authorizing it, the legal effect of a consolidation is to extinguish the constituent companies, and to create a new corporation with property, liabilities, and stockholders derived from those then passing out of existence;" citing McMahan v. Morrison, 16 Ind. 172, 79 Am. Dec. 418; Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685; Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. 25, sub nom. Ferguson v. Meredith, 17 L. ed. 604; Shields v. State, 26 Ohio St. 86, same case on error, 95 U. S. 319, 24 L. ed. 357; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia, 92 U. S. 665, 23 L. ed. 757; Maine C. R. Co. v. Maine, 96 U. S. 499, 24 L. ed. 836; Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U.

S. 359, 25 L. ed. 185. Mr. Justice Strong says in Atlantic & G. R. Co. v. Georgia, 98 U. S. 360, 25 L. ed. 186, that this view of consolidation accords with sound reason. And to the same effect are Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Berry, 44 Ark. 22, and Atlanta & C. Air-Line R. Co. v. State, 63 Ga. 486. As before remarked, however, it is not necessary for us to hold that the true definition of the word "consolidation" is such union of two or more corporations as necessarily results in the creation of a new corporation. We merely remark upon what we think the true definition of the word should be held to be, in the interest of clearness and definiteness in legal phraseology, adding the authorities which restrict its signification as indicated above. But it is most earnestly insisted by learned counsel for the railroad company that the case of Natchez, J. & O.

goes no further than to exempt the company from the payment of a license tax or fee proper; that is, a specific tax without regard to value. The corporation remains liable, as before, to a tax upon its franchise ad valorem as property. South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Bellevue, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 1184, 57 L. R. A. 50, 49 S. W. 23.

A railroad charter providing for a commutation tax, and that no further or other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon the company, does not exempt the franchises and privileges of the corporation alone, but it also exempts the company generally from all other taxation to which its property, in common with the property of individuals, would have been subject without such special exemption. State v. Berry, 17 N. J. L. 80; Camden & A. R. Co. v. Hilligan, 18 N. J. L. 11.

There are, said Chief Justice Waite in one case in the Supreme Court of the United States, undoubtedly many cases in this and other courts where it has been held that an exemption of the capital stock of a corporation from taxation is equivalent to an exemption of the property into which the capital has been converted. But in all these cases we think it will be found that the question turned upon the effect to be given to the term "capital" or "capital stock" as used in the particular charter under consideration, and that, when property has been exempted, it has been because, taking the whole charter together, it was apparent that the legislature so intended. Thus, the capital stock of a bank usually consists of money paid in to be used in banking, and an exemption of such capital stock from taxation must always necessarily mean an exemption of the securities into which the money has been converted in the regular course of a banking business. And, in general, an exemption of capital stock, without more, may, with great propriety, be considered, under ordinary circumstances, as exempting that which in the legitimate operations of the corporation comes to represent the capital. But here, while the capital stock is exempt forever, the "road with all its fixtures and appurtenances, including workshops, warehouses, and vehicles of transportation," becomes taxable after a limited time. Clearly, under such circumstances, it could not have been understood that the enumerated property was to represent the capital for the purposes of taxation. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091.

While, in the absence of any words showing a different intent, an exemption of the capital stock of a corporation may imply and carry with it an exemption of the property in which such stock is invested, yet, if the legislature uses language at variance with such intention, the courts, which never presume a purpose to exempt any property from its just share of the public burdens, will construe any doubts which may arise as to the proper interpretation of the charter against the exemption. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Wright, 164 U. S. 327, 41 L. ed. 454, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 80.

Thus, under a clause in a corporate charter, providing that the railroad and the appurtenances of the company thereby incorporated shall not be taxed higher than a stated percentage upon the annual net income of the corporation, and that no municipal or other corporation shall have power to tax the "stock" of the said company, but may tax its property, real and personal, within the local jurisdiction in the ratio of taxation of other like property in the locality, the right of municipalities to tax the railroad property within their several jurisdictions is not restricted to such property as is not embraced in the phrase "railroad and appurtenances," nor is the property represented by the corporate "stock" exempt from municipal taxation beyond the percentage named in the charter; but the municipalities have a right to tax all the real and personal property of the corporation within their respective limits in the same ratio that they tax other similar property. Ibid.

The word "stock," in such a charter, ordinarily includes the property of the corporation represented by its stock; but this is only true when the context does not require a different construction, nor show that the word was used in a different sense. Ibid.

It is, says Brown, J., in that case, contended that the prohibition of the taxation of the stock applies equally to the property represented by the stock. In support of this contention, we are cited to decisions holding that a tax upon the property is a tax upon the stock. In examining these cases, it will be found that the words "stock," or "capital stock," were used in the sense of the capital, the plant, or property of the company, and not in the sense of stock or shares of stock as distinguished from the property of the company. Ibid.

A general exemption of the capital stock of a corporation without any qualifying words exempts the corporate property in which the capital stands invested. Rome R. Co. v. Rome.

R. Co. v. Lambert, 70 Miss. 781, 13 So. 33, is res judicata of this entire controversy. Except in the single particular to be hereinafter mentioned, this position is wholly untenable. The rule laid down by Mr. Justice Field of the United States Supreme Court in Cromwell v. Sac County, 94 U. S. 351, 24 L. ed. 195, Reaffirmed in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 304, 38 L. ed. 451, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608, and in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 397, 42 L. ed. 211, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905, and in Southern P. R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. at page 48, 42 L. ed. at page 376, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 18, is this: That where the parties are the same, and the subject-matter and cause of action are the same, the estoppel extends, not only to what was decided, but to all that might have been decided, in that case; but where the parties are substantially the same, but the cause of action different, it only extends to what was necessarily involved and was actually decided in the first suit,—which is the doctrine laid down in the Duchess of Kingston's Case [20 How. St. Tr. 355]. The parties in the Lambert Case were the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company and the sheriff of Adams county, and the subject-matter or cause of action was the tax, state and county, on the part of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad within Adams county. The exemption asserted was under the charter of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company. In this case the parties are the Illinois Central Railroad Company and the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company on the one hand and the state revenue agent on the other, and the subject-matter is state and county taxes of an entirely dif-

14 Ga. 275; Connersville v. Bank of the State, 16 Ind. 105.

A section in a railroad charter providing that whenever any portion of the road shall be completed through the state, and is paying an interest of 8 per cent per annum on its cost, and not before, such portion may be taxed the same percentage, and no more, upon the capital expended in the construction thereof as lands in the state shall be taxed, is susceptible of no other construction than that the corporation is to be exempt from all taxation until by its earnings it shall pay an annual interest of 8 per cent upon that part of its road within the state, after which the road becomes subject to taxation at the rate per cent that lands are taxed by the general revenue laws of the state then in force. If, said the court, the language employed seems awkward, it is not for us, by verbal refinements, to strip it of its manifest meaning and intention. That such exemption from taxation, contained in the charter of a corporation organized under it, is irrevocable and inviolable, is too well settled to need elucidation or citation of authorities. No principle has been more repeatedly, or more violently, assailed; none has more successfully withstood the shock of every assault. It is believed that no good purpose can be subserved by an extended discussion of it. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Moseley, 52 Miss. 127.

A railroad charter containing a section, reading: "The stock of said company shall be exempt from taxation for the period of twenty years after its completion,"—exempts the property represented by the stock. Scotland County v. Missouri, 1. & N. R. Co. 65 Mo. 123.

In accordance, said the court in that case, with the decision of this court in the case of Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Shacklett, 30 Mo. 550, supported as it is by numerous decisions in other states, it is clear that a tax on the property represented by the stock is substantially a tax on the stock. It is simply respectful to the legislature to assume that a valuable privilege was designed to be conferred by this section; but, if the exemption of the stock did not extend to the property which the stock represents, the section was purely illusory. Ibid.

The Maryland court of appeals entertains—at least, did at one time entertain—similar views. It decided, in one set of cases, that, as the stock represents the property of a company, the exemption of the one must be considered the exemption of both, unless the exemption is made on the ground of selection to show which 60 L. R. A.

is intended to be taxed to the exclusion of the other. Tax Cases, 12 Gill & J. 117.

And in another case it declared that it is perfectly understood that the stock of a bank is the representative of its whole property; and, when a tax has been laid on the stock in the hands of the shareholders, the real and personal estate of the corporation becomes exempt from taxation. To tax both the real and personal property and the stock would be a double tax, and therefore illegal and unjust. Gordon v. Baltimore, 5 Gill, 236.

And in a third it held that a charter provision that the shares of stock of the company shall be personal property, and exempt from the imposition of any tax or burden, exempted the company, as well as the stock, from taxation. Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531. In this case the decision was that, as the shares of the capital stock of a corporation embraced all its property, tangible and intangible, and its franchise, a declaration in the act incorporating the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, that, in consideration of the payment annually of 6 per cent on $3,000,000 of state construction bonds, the shares of its capital stock should be deemed personal estate and be exempt from any tax or burden, gave immunity from taxation to everything which constituted the stock and gave it value. That it not only saved the company from all state taxes, but also from taxation by any local government within whose jurisdiction the company might have either real or personal property. A right the state does not possess, she cannot delegate to her subordinates.

In Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529, the Supreme Court of the United States held that an exemption from taxation, given in these terms: That, upon any of the aforesaid banks accepting and complying with the terms and conditions of this act, the faith of the state is hereby pledged not to impose any further tax or burden upon them during the continuance of their charters under this act,—carried exemption from taxation to the shares of stock in such banks held by the stockholders.

In New Jersey the same view was adopted. A section of the charter of a transportation company, enacting that from and after the completion of the works it should be the duty of the corporate treasurer, quarterly, to make sworn returns of the number of passengers and tons of freight carried on the line, and to pay the state treasurer 10 cents for each passenger and 15 cents for each ton of merchandise ferent railroad, the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad, and an exemption is claimed under the charter of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, an entirely different charter. It is perfectly manifest, therefore, that neither the parties nor the subject-matter are the same, except in the particular to be hereafter mentioned. The thing adjudged in the Lambert Case was that state and county taxes were not due on that part of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company lying within Adams county. It is true, the principle of the decision would extend to the exemption of the whole property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, but that was not the thing adjudged, and that feature of the decision is persuasive under the doctrine of stare decisis, and not binding as an estoppel under the doctrine of res judicata. It is also true that to claim the benefit of res judicata as estoppel, in the strict and technical sense, it must be pleaded or offered in evidence. It is further to be remarked that it is not the reason which a court gives for its decision which constitutes estoppel, but the thing it adjudges. This is well settled in Buckner v. Calcoate, 28 Miss. 432. The property adjudged by a court to a litigant is his thenceforward under the doctrine of res judicata as a rule of property as against the parties in that same litigation; but the reasons which the court may give for the decision are thereafter simply persuasive under the doctrine of stare decisis, and not in themselves to be invoked as the estoppel. It is a mere confusion of thought to blend these two wholly different principles underlying these legal doctrines, and thus practically treating them as the transported, and that no other tax or impost should be levied or assessed upon the said company, extends the granted exemption to the interest of the individual stockholders in the property of the corporation. State, Fish, Prosecutor, v. Branin, 23 N. J. L. 484.

The court said in that case that the principle must be considered as settled that an exemption of the corporation exempts also the stockholder from taxation upon his individual stock. Ibid.

But, while so deciding in respect of the charter contract of exemption, the court also held that a bank stockholder is taxable on his stock notwithstanding his bank is also taxed at the same time upon its capital. This is taxing the same thing twice, it is oppressive, unequal, and unjust, but the legislature has the power to do just this thing. Ibid.

Sections in railroad charters, enacting that, as soon as the net proceeds of operation shall amount to a stated percentage upon the cost of the roads, the corporations shall pay a state tax annually of a certain other percentage upon such cost, and that no other tax or impost shall be levied or assessed upon said companies, include the stockholders in the roads, and exempt them from taxation upon their stock. State, Vall, Prosecutor, v. Bentley, 23 N. J. L. 532.

And, citing these two cases, Green, Ch. J., afterwards said: The principle has been repeatedly recognised, and must be considered as clearly settled, that, when an incorporated company is by its charter exempt from taxation, the stock of the company in the hands of the stockholders is also exempt. State, Colt, Prosecutor, v. Powers, 24 N. J. L. 400.

It has long been the accepted law of New Jersey that an enactment which exempts a corporation or its property from taxation exempts also the shares of its stock held by individuals. The reasoning of the court upon which that conclusion was rested was that, as the entire burden of taxes levied upon a corporation ultimately fell upon the shares of stock, it must have been the intention of the legislature, in exempting the former, to relieve the latter. The converse of this, it seems, must be conceded, so that an express exemption of the shares from taxation will also exempt the company; otherwise the exemption is in fact not an exemption, for every burden cast upon the property of the company is a burden upon the shares which represent that property. State, Singer Mfg. Co., Prosecutor, v. Heppenheimer, 58 N. J. L. 633, 32 L. R. A. 643, 34 Atl. 1061.

There was no dissent in this case, but, when the controversy in it was renewed, later, Dixon, J., dissented. He had, in the interim, seen a new light. He admitted that the past decisions in his state had been to the effect just stated, but thought a contrary doctrine had been established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that the older view was unsound. Hancock v. Singer Mfg. Co. 62 N. J. L. 289, 42 L. R. A. 852, 41 Atl. 846.

A railroad charter providing that all machines, wagons, vehicles, and carriages purchased with the funds of the company, and all works constructed under the authority of the charter, and all profits which should accrue therefrom should be vested in the several shareholders forever in proportion to their respective shares, and should be deemed personal estate and be exempt from any public charge or tax whatsoever,—exempts, not only the shares of stock of the corporation from taxation, but the property and earnings thereof as well. Com. v. Richmond & P. R. Co. 81 Va. 355.

The case followed in this respect the earlier one of Richmond v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 21 Gratt. 604, which involved a substantially like charter provision,—a little less "wordy and emphatic," but one "importing precisely the same thing."

A section in the charter of a bank making it the cashier's duty, on a named day, annually, to pay into the state treasury 25 cents on each $100 of stock held and paid for in such bank in full of all tax or bonus, with a proviso that the legislature might increase or diminish the same, but at no time should the tax exceed double that rate, is a limitation on the legislative power to tax the stock. It is a contract between the stockholders and the state, inviolable so far as it is intended to operate. The power reserved to augment the tax is a power to tax the corporation only, to burden equally all the stockholders, residents and non-residents, alike. There is no power reserved or resulting to tax an individual stockholder, although a resident. The object of the section is to secure the stockholders against unlimited and capricious taxation of their stock. Johnson v. Com. 7 Dana, 342.

A section in the charter of a railroad corporation declaring that the capital stock of the company shall be forever exempt from taxation, and that the road, with all its fixtures and appurtenances, including workshops, warehouses, and vehicles of transportation, shall be exempt from taxation for the period of twenty same. Nor are the taxes of any one year the same cause of action as the taxes of any other year, in the only proper technical signification to be given to the term res judicata. It is so held by the United States Supreme Court in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 304, 38 L. ed. 451, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 608, and in Phoenix F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee, 161 U. S., at page 186, 40 L. ed. at page 664, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471. A decision for the taxes of any one year may be invoked under the doctrine of stare decisis, where the taxes of any other year are involved under the same claim; but certainly never, on any clear thinking or correct reasoning, under the doctrine of res judicata. On this very subject the supreme court of Iowa said, in Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 639, 640: "Each year's taxes constitute a distinct and separate cause of action, and the determination of the matters involved in the injunction reached no further than the taxes for the years then in question. The cases are unlike those where two causes of action (as two promissory notes) forming the subject-matter of successive actions between the same parties, both growing out of the same transaction, in which a defense set up in the first suit, and held good, will conclude the parties in the second. . . . But the taxes of separate years do not, in any just sense, grow out of the same transaction. They are like distinct claims on two different promissory notes, made upon two distinct and separate, though similar, transactions between the same parties. A judgment on one of such notes, it is quite clear, would not be of any force as an estoppel in an action on the other note between the same years from the completion of the road, exempts the shares of stock. Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 29 L. ed. 830, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

But Waite, Ch. J., in that case says: It is, no doubt, true that the legislature may make a difference, for the purposes of taxation, between the capital stock of a corporation in the hands of the corporation itself and the shares of the same capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders. That has often been done; and the cases are numerous where the exemption of shares from taxation has been claimed because of a charter exemption of capital stock. Ibid.

A provision in a corporate charter that 3,000 shares of the stock of the corporation, or whatever amount of the same is found to be requisite for the construction of its works, shall be exempt from all taxation whatever, except that when the net annual income from said works exceeds 6 per cent on the cost thereof the excess shall be taxable for state purposes only at the same rates as are imposed on bank dividends for such purposes, does not exempt the capital stock of the corporation, but only the shares in the hands of the stockholders,—two different things in the taxing statutes of Pennsylvania. Com. v. Minersville Water Co. 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 17.

A clause in a railroad charter declaring that all the real estate held by the company for right of way, for station places of any kind, and for workshop locations shall be exempt from taxation until the dividends of profits exceed 6 per cent annually, does not exempt the stockholders from taxation upon their shares of the capital stock. Belo v. Forsyth County, 82 N. C. 415, 33 Am. Rep. 688.

A provision in a corporate charter imposing a state tax of a certain percentage upon the amount of capital actually paid in is one laying a tax upon the capital stock of the corporation, and amounts to a contract for the exemption thereof from further taxes; but it does not prevent the state from thereafter taxing the stockholders ad valorem on their shares of stock, as the subject-matters of the two taxes are separate and distinct. Memphis v. Home Ins. Co. 91 Tenn. 558, 19 S. W. 1042.

The doctrine that the exemption of the capital of a corporation does not of necessity include the exemption of the shareholders is said to be now too well settled to be questioned. New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905.

2. The Tennessee bank cases.

As early as 1836 it was decided in Tennessee that an act incorporating a bank, providing that, in consideration of the grant of its rights and privileges, such bank should pay the state annually $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on the amount of capital stock paid in by all the stockholders except the state itself, constituted a contract which could not be impaired by a subsequent law, nor even by a constitutional amendment subjecting such bank stock to another and a higher tax. It followed, and was so held, that a constitutional amendment and a statute passed pursuant thereto, postdating the charter, and providing for the taxation of bank stock, did not apply to such bank, except as to such of its shares as were in the hands of resident stockholders, and its property other than the powers and privileges conferred in its charter, one of which was the right to employ its entire capital, undiminished by any tax, in its legitimate banking business. The court distinguished the capital stock of the bank from the capital stock held in shares by the stockholders,—the one corporate and the other individual property; and considered, also, that the banking house had no immediate connection with the banking franchise. Its thought was that a tax on the capital stock was one upon the franchise, and the right to lay this had been bargained away; but that the state could still tax shares owned by residents and the banking house and other assets in which the capital had been invested. Union Bank v. State, 9 Yerg. 490.

In the decade following 1850 the Tennessee legislature granted several corporate charters in which were commutations of taxes, and out of which grew the litigations now to be noted.

The Home Insurance Company was incorporated March 2, 1854, and § 30 of its charter provided that there should be a state tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent upon the amount of capital actually paid in. But that charter contained parties. In support of these views, see the following cases,"—citing twelve cases. Mr. Justice White says in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 42 L. ed. 202, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905, that this was practically overruled in Goodenow v. Litchfield, 59 Iowa, 226, 9 N. W. 107, 13 N. W. 86. But Seever, Ch. J., in that case says (at p. 236, 59 Iowa, 9 N. W. 107, and 13 N. W. 86) that the cases are not in conflict. And Rothrock, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in the Goodenow Case, says, at page 234, 59 Iowa, and page 110, 9 N. W.: "That [the case in 38 Iowa] was a direct proceeding by the taxing power to collect its revenue, and it may well be questioned whether any decree could operate upon future assessments and levies,"—the very principle announced in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

no statement that such tax should be in lieu of other taxation.

February 29, 1856, an act was passed chartering the Chattanooga Savings Institution, and § 3 of that charter provided, among other things, that the corporation should pay to the state an annual tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on each share of capital stock, which should be in lieu of all other taxes. Successive after-enacted statutes authorized the corporation to remove to Memphis, and to change its name, first to the Savings Bank of Memphis, and later to the Bank of Commerce.

On March 20, 1858, the legislature incorporated the De Soto Insurance & Trust Company to do a fire and life insurance business with a capital stock not exceeding $300,000. Section 10 of that charter was identical in respect of taxation with the one last mentioned. In 1869, the legislature authorized the corporation to discontinue the insurance business, and undertake that of banking under the name of the Union & Planters' Bank of Memphis, and to increase its capital up to $1,000,000, and to retain all its rights, privileges, and immunities, excepting only that of insurance.

Other charters were granted about the same time with exemptions and commutations expressed in like terms.

In a case decided at the April term, 1873, the first in point in the order of the state reports, Freeman, J., opens the opinion of the supreme court of Tennessee by saying: It is admitted that a tax has been levied properly on the shares of the stock if the shares of stock are liable for such a tax. We need not further discuss this question, as the principles announced in the other cases settle it. But he does not cite the other cases to which he refers; neither does he restate the principles announced in them; nor does he say whether, in the case at bar, the tax levied on the shares was or was not sustained. He, however, proceeds to say: But the city has levied a tax on the bank building and ground. This is claimed to be, also, exempt, under the clause in the charter which provides that the institution shall pay an annual tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on each share of capital stock, which shall be in lieu of all other taxes whatever. And the conclusion adopted was that so much of the banking house as was used and occupied in the business of the bank was exempt, while the rest leased to others was taxable. De Soto Bank v. Memphis, 6 Baxt. 415, 32 Am. Rep. 530.

The next case arose over the tax upon the

It will, however, be distinctly observed, and we direct emphatic attention to this statement, that whether the decision for taxes of one year is res judicata as to taxes for another year, preferred under the same claims, as held in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 397, 42 L. ed. 211, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905, is wholly immaterial here, since the parties to this litigation are not the same with the parties to the litigation in the Lambert Case, except, perhaps, as hereafter indicated. There is, therefore, no res judicata arising out of the Lambert Case, except as will be indicated; and that exception is this: Perhaps the state revenue agent as to the taxes, state and county, on the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company in Adams county for the year 1892 may be regarded properly and substantially as the same party with the sheriff of Adams county, and the Nat-shares held by a stockholder in the Union & Planters' Bank, who claimed immunity by force of the above-mentioned charter provision. The state court held this did not exonerate him; that the stockholders of this bank were taxable upon their shares therein under the general revenue law of the state declaring that no tax should thereafter be assessed on bank capital, but that stockholders should be assessed and taxed upon the value of their shares. It was held that corporate capital stock in the aggregate, and share stock in severalty held individually, were two different and distinct things, each a separate subject of taxation. Memphis v. Farrington, 8 Baxt. 539.

The case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there the judgment was reversed. That tribunal held that the pertinent clause in the bank's charter constituted a contract between the state and the bank, the obligation of which prevented the imposition of a tax on the shares of its stockholders. Three of the justices, Strong, Clifford, and Field, JJ., dissented on the ground that the exemption in the charter was given to the bank, and not to its stockholders. Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 24 L. ed. 538.

The next case in the state court involved the question decided in De Soto Bank v. Memphis, 6 Baxt. 415, 32 Am. Rep. 530, as to the taxability of the banking house of the Bank of Commerce, which in part was rented out for other purposes, and the former decision was followed. In the course of the opinion in this case it was said: There is nothing in conflict with this view, as the learned counsel for the complainant seems to think, in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 679, 24 L. ed. 538. It was there held that the provision in a bank charter like the one before us is a contract, and will protect the shares of the stockholders from additional taxation. We recognize the controlling authority of that court in such cases, and yield to its decisions. The provisions in question will, therefore, protect the capital stock and the shares of the stockholders from additional taxation. Bank of Commerce v. McGowan, 6 Lea, 703, Affirmed in 104 U. S. 493, 26 L. ed. 810.

The city of Memphis having assessed the banking house of the Union & Planters' Bank for the years 1874 to 1878 inclusive, the state court, in 1884, again held the bank exempt by chez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company as to the same taxes on the same part of its property may properly be regarded as substantially the same party with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, into which the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company has been integrated. Substantially, in this small particular, as to the state and county taxes for the year 1892 on that part of the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, lying in Adams county, the parties may be said to be the same, and the cause of action the same; and we hold, accordingly, that as to that the railroad company is entitled to claim the exemption under the Lambert Case as res judicata. Except as to this alone there is clearly, as we think, no right to invoke the Lambert Case as res judicata, for the reason that the parties are not the same, without reference to other considerations. And let it be further specially noted that the Lambert Case went off on demurrer, and the evidence in this case was not before the court. It is well said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 313, 38 L. ed. 455, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, in an opinion of unusual clearness and power, that "it is not to be tolerated that the state should be forever debarred of its taxes by an erroneous decision." Page 316, 152 U. S., page 456, 38 L. ed. and page 597, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. But it is said, if the Lambert Case is not res judicata, it should control this case under the doctrine of stare decisis. There is one view of the Lambert Case which authorizes the appeal to the doctrine of stare decisis. It did distinctly decide that what virtue of this clause in the charter, Freeman, J., dissenting. State v. Butler, 13 Lea, 407.

In that case, the court stated its understanding of the Farrington decision, thus: In the case of Memphis v. Farrington, 8 Baxt. 539, Farrington was the owner of a number of shares of stock in this Identical Union & Planters' Bank, upon which the state assessed taxes the payment of which was resisted upon the ground that the shares of stock were exempt under the above-cited provisions of the charter. In the opinion of this court delivered in that case it was conceded that, under the provisions of the charter, the payment of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent had the effect to relieve or exempt the capital stock of the bank from the payment of any other taxes. But it was held that there was a distinction between the capital stock of the bank and the shares of stock owned and held by individuals; that it was not the purpose of the legislature to exempt both, and hence the individual shares of stock owned by Farrington were subject to taxation. The cause was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where it was held that the charter was a contract between the state and the bank, and the tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent of the capital stock was in lieu of all other taxes, and hence the shares of said capital stock were not subject to any additional tax in the hands of the holder. Hence, the judgment of this court was reversed with directions to enter a decree in favor of the stockholder. Ibid.

Four years afterwards the court decided against the validity of an assessment by the city of Memphis for five years' taxes, between 1872 and 1879, on the capital stock and the banking house and lot of the Bank of Commerce. The right of this bank, granting no fatal defect in the original organization, or other extrinsic circumstance, neither of which, as the court found on examination, existed, to an exemption from all other taxes upon its capital stock and property necessary to the conduct of its business upon payment of the commuted tax prescribed in its charter, was held to be beyond debate. State use of Memphis v. Butler, 86 Tenn. 614, 8 S. W. 586.

In 1892 the state court decided that exemption and commutation clauses in corporate charters in the language above given entitled the corporations to immunity against privilege taxes imposed upon the right to carry on business under their franchises. And it declared that such corporations could be subjected, neither to ad valorem taxes upon their capital stock, nor, in the alternative, to taxes upon their shares in the hands of their stockholders. And that, whether the attempt to tax one or the other be made by later constitutional or statutory law, it must fail, because of contract exemption from both kinds of taxation, which the state could not impair. The court held the shares exempt on the authority of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in Farrington v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 879, 24 L. ed. 558, and Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 130, 29 L. ed. 832, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645, and the capital stock of the corporation likewise exempt upon the authority of its own previous decisions. Memphis v. Union & P. Bank, 91 Tenn. 546, 19 S. W. 758.

Immediately afterward the same court had to interpret the clause concerning a commuted tax in the charter of the Home Insurance Company. That clause did not state that the tax prescribed was in lieu of other taxation of any kind. Manifestly, said the court, this charter tax was laid upon the capital stock, and was by the legislature intended to operate as an exemption of the corporation from further taxation on that stock. Though not expressed in so many words, the exemption results by necessary implication from the language employed. The prescribed tax is the full pecuniary consideration to be paid by the corporation for the franchises granted by the state. Among those franchises is that of owning and using the capital stock for the purposes contemplated in the charter. To exact an additional tax upon the company's capital stock is to exact an additional consideration for the thing, or one of the things, granted in the first instance. That cannot lawfully be done. The charter is a contract whose obligation the state cannot impair by tax laws or otherwise. This decides but half the case, however, and it remains to inquire whether the charter exemption extends to the "shares of stock." Capital stock and shares of stock are different things, and form different subjects of taxation. A tax upon the one is not a tax upon the other, nor is an exemption of the one an exemption of the other. In the case at bar it has been seen that the charter tax is laid upon the capital stock, and that by implication that subject of taxation is to be exempted from further assessment. That tax is laid upon the one subject of taxation only; and the implication arising therefrom can by no fair construction be held to have greater scope. The implied exemption cannot be broader than the express tax. It becomes perfectly clear that the shares of stock in the Home Insurance Company are subject to ad occurred between these companies was merger, and not consolidation, and that no new corporation was created thereby, applying the principles of Maine C. R. Co. v. Maine, 96 U. S. 499, 24 L. ed. 836, to the facts of this case, which are, in our judgment, wholly different from the facts in the Maine Case. It did not decide, of course,—holding that the case was one of merger,—whether § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 would have cut off the exemption had there been a consolidation creating a new corporation. Holding that it was a case of mere merger, the court very naturally held that § 181 of the Constitution of 1890 had no effect on the exemption claimed, in that view. The court most emphatically did not decide that, had there been a consolidation resulting in the creation of a new corporation after the Constitution of 1890 went into effect, such new corporation could claim that an exemption belonging to one of its constituents prior to that Constitution, as the property of the absorbed company alone, was continued by virtue of § 181. There is no process of interpretation by which the decision in the Lambert Case can be so distorted as to mean any such thing. The court proceeded throughout upon the proposition that, it being a mere case of merger, the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company absorbing the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad, § 181 had no effect upon the exemption, and that such exemption passed to the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Company so far as the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company was concerned. If it had been a mere case of merger, as held by the court, we think it clear, as hereinbefore pointed valorem taxation in such manner as the state may by proper statute prescribe. State v. Home Ins. Co. 91 Tenn. 558, 19 S. W. 1042.

The next case to be decided in the Tennessee supreme court was the state's action in behalf of the city of Memphis to recover from the Memphis City Bank, and from its stockholders respectively, certain ad valorem taxes alleged to be due on capital stock and on shares of stock. It was defended upon the ground that § 17 of the charter of the Memphis City Fire & General Insurance Company, the original corporation, in substance the same as those already noticed, gave exemption. The court, assuming, argumentatively, that the bank was entitled to the immunity given by that section, held that the tax prescribed in it was a pecuniary consideration paid for the franchise,—a tax laid expressly on the capital stock, and intended obviously to be in lieu of all other taxes and assessments on that particular subject. That such capital stock could not be taxed, either by the state, or by any county or municipality thereof. This was a contract the state could not impair. But the shares of stock are a different subject of taxation. The charter contract did not protect them. The exemption of the capital stock was not an exemption of the shares, nor the taxation of the former the taxation of the latter. But the case went on to hold that, because the original corporation had, by subsequent legislation, been converted from an insurance company into a bank, and such transmutation had taken place after a new Constitution became operative, that took power away from the legislature to grant or perpetuate immunity from taxation by force of a command that all property should be taxed, even the exemption of the corporation on its capital stock had not survived. State v. Memphis City Bank, 91 Tenn. 574, 19 S. W. 1045.

The case was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court, 161 U. S. 186, 40 L. ed. 664, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468.

In 1895 the state court decided that such commutation and exemption clause did not prevent the taxation of the surplus and undivided profits of the Bank of Commerce. It protected nothing but capital stock, and surplus and profits were not to be so classed. State v. Bank of Commerce, 95 Tenn. 221, 31 S. W. 993.

It was also held in that case that the provision in this bank's charter, that the bank should have a lien on the stock for debts due it by its stockholders before and in preference to other creditors except the state for taxes, and should pay to the state an annual tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on each share of capital stock, which should be in lieu of all other taxes, was a contract limiting the power of the state to tax the capital stock of the corporation, but one that still left the shares of stock belonging to the stockholders subject to general taxation; the subjects being distinct, and both not being exempt. Ibid.

To reach the latter conclusion, the court refused to follow, and essayed to distinguish, the Farrington Case. It was constrained to this course, because in a footnote to that case, and in the cognate case of Wicks v. Tennessee, 95 U. S. 690, 24 L. ed. 561, a case involving the identical charter then before it, but technically not res judicata because of involving taxes for a different year, the United States Supreme Court had said that it was disposed of by the opinion in the Farrington Case; that the questions were substantially the same, and the result must be the same. In attempting to distinguish the Farrington Case, the state court said that the language of the two charters in question was materially different and that the correct text of the charter in the case at bar was not in the record in the United States Supreme Court. Ibid. Two members of the court, Snodgrass, Ch. J., and McAllister, J., dissented.

In the United States Supreme Court it was held that this bank was taxable on its surplus. Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. ed. 645, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456.

And it was declared that the statement had been many times repeated, and was not longer disputed by any, that the capital stock of a corporation, and the shares into which such stock may be divided and held by individual stockholders, are two distinct pieces of property. It is not double taxation to tax both. One may be exempted without exempting the other. Ibid. The Farrington Case was followed, and it was again held that the shares of stock in the hands of the stockholders were exempt under this charter. Mr. Justice Peckham, who wrote for the court, thought the difference in verbiage between the two charters not material, and said that, as the whole charter had been before the court, the point made on this difference could not have been overlooked.

A reargument of this case was had, and on the rehearing it was decided that while the provision in the charter for a commuted annual out, that that exemption did not pass, and that the court was in error in so holding, because of the well-settled proposition hereinbefore stated, and supported by the authorities, that under the general law alone, without reference to the Constitution, an exemption will not pass in a case of merger to the absorbing company which attached to the property of the company merged alone, unless the legislation authorizing in such case merger either expressly declared that the exemption shall pass, or used the word "immunity," or an equivalent word. It was correct, in fact, to say that the exemption of the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company passed to the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Company by virtue of the word "immunities," used in the act of 1890, authorizing a sale or consolidation of the Natchez,

Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company with the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad (Laws 1890, p. 675), provided, always, that exemption was legal in its origin, the validity of which exemption was not contested, but conceded, in the Lambert Case, but which was clearly invalid, as we shall show later in this opinion. The power of the word "immunities" in said act to pass such exemption to the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad under said act of 1890 was exhausted by that consolidation, and had no virtue to carry that exemption into the new company, the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, resulting from the consolidation, even had § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 not been adopted. We have most carefully considered the Lambert Case. Giving all due weight to the doctrine of stare decisis, and tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on each share of the capital stock in lieu of all other taxes constituted a contract exempting the shares of stock from taxation beyond that rate, yet, where no limit had been put on the amount of capital the bank might have, and the charter gave each depositor to the amount of the par value of the shares a right to convert his deposit into a share of stock, the state had a right at any time to make shares afterwards issued taxable at any rate, and was under no obligation to exempt future shares as past ones were. Hence, when a Constitution was adopted making bank stock taxable, after-issued shares became subject to taxation, but antecedent issues retained their exemption. Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 163 U. S. 416, 41 L. ed. 211, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1113.

In 1896 the United States Supreme Court had again before it the commutation and exemption clause in the charter of the Union & Planters' Bank. Mr. Justice Peckham, writing of the decision in the Farrington Case, says: The whole court was of one opinion upon the subject that there was no substantial difference in the extent of the exemption contained in the several charters, although there was some difference in their phraseology. But the question was, Which of the parties was to receive the benefit of the exemption? Was it to be the corporation, or was it intended for the individual stockholder? It was upon that question that the court divided, those in the minority believing that the exemption was intended in each case for the corporation, while the case as actually decided holds that the individual shareholder was entitled to the benefit of the exemption, and there is no adjudication that the exemption extended also to the corporation and its property. Thereupon the court decided that the commutation and exemption clause amounted to a contract which freed from taxes the shares of stock belonging to the stockholders, but gave no exemption to the corporation from taxes upon its capital stock, its accumulated surplus, or its other property; and therefore, that taxing the Union & Planters' Bank upon its capital and surplus did not impair the obligation of its charter contract. Shelby County v. Union & Planters' Bank, 161 U. S. 149, 40 L. ed. 650, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 558.

This decision necessarily overruled the line of decisions above cited of the Tennessee supreme court, that the capital stock and landed property essential to the business of the corporations were exempt from taxation in virtue of these charter contracts.

This result was recognized by the state court in 1898, in a case deciding that, inasmuch as a section of a bank charter providing that the bank shall pay to the state an annual tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on each share of stock subscribed in lieu of all other taxes has been finally construed by the United States Supreme Court to exempt from taxation the shares of stock in the hands of the stockholders, and not the capital stock of the bank, contrary to the construction adopted by the supreme court of Tennessee in a line of cases, the state courts are compelled to reverse their previous rulings. It follows that the cases holding that such a section gives immunity from privilege taxes as a corollary to the immunity from taxes on the capital stock must also be overruled; that is, the immunity on capital stock having disappeared, immunity from privilege taxes falls, too. In spite, therefore, of such a clause in its charter, a bank, although protected by an independent statute from taxation on its capital stock, is liable to a privilege tax by the city and county in which it is located. Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 101 Tenn. 154, 46 S. W. 557.

The latest reported phase of the controversy to the date of writing was the effort, in the Federal court of the Union & Planters' Bank to restrain the city of Memphis from collecting taxes and imposing future taxes upon its capital stock ad valorem under the Tennessee revenue acts of 1897 and 1899. The jurisdiction of the court to entertain the cause was denied by the city, but it was decided that a Federal court has jurisdiction of a suit in equity for injunctive relief, between a domestic banking and a municipal corporation created by the same state, to restrain the collection of a tax assessed at a greater sum than $2,000, upon allegations that it was imposed under statutes that were unconstitutional for impairing the obligation of a contract of commutation and exemption in the charter of the bank, because thereby a Federal question was raised independent of diverse citizenship. The bank relied upon two propositions: (1) that it had a charter exemption, and the imposition of the tax was invalid under the contract clause of the Constitution of the Union; (2) that the city was estopped by the previous judgments of the supreme court of Tennessee that the bank was exempt by its charter from taxes of this kind. Upon the first proposition, it was decided that the charter provision sub judice created no contract exempting the bank from capital stock taxation, but one merely exempt-as to the two propositions that what occurred here was merger, and not consolidation creating a new corporation, and that the exemption, consequently, of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad properly passed to the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, even in the view of merger, under the legislation alone, we hereby expressly overrule the Lambert Case. Exemptions, where proper, should be expressly granted,—not stealthily referenced in.

2. We turn now to a second ground of decision, wholly independent of, and disconnected from, all that we have said in the first ground, from which we think the same result must follow. The exemption asserted here is that contained in the 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern Railroad Company's charter, which is as follows: "Sec. 21. Be it further enacted, that in consideration of the construction of the railroads provided for herein, and of the great benefit which the state will receive in the development of its agricultural resources by means of said railroads as works of internal improvement, and also of the increased value which will thereby be added to the property of the state, thus enabling the state to greatly increase its revenue without additional and burdensome taxation upon the people, the state hereby agrees with said company (and which agreement is irrevocable), that all taxes to which said company shall be subject for the period of thirty years are hereby appropriated and set apart, and shall be applied to the payment of debts and liabilities which the said company may have incurred in the construction of said road, or for money borrowed by said company upon lands or otherwise, to be used

ing its stockholders from taxes upon their shares; therefore, the tax complained of was valid and constitutional. The bank's contention to support the second proposition was that, granting the course of decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States had settled the law generally that a clause for commuted taxation and exemption in the terms contained in its charter exempted from taxation stockholders upon their shares, but did not exempt the bank from taxation upon its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, nevertheless, as the supreme court of the state, in a controversy between the same parties over taxes of the same kind levied in previous years, had solemnly decided that this bank was exempt by virtue of the provision in its charter, that decision was res judicata, and conclusively estopped the city from imposing again in future years the same taxes on the same bank. It was insisted that a Federal court was imperatively bound to so hold under the decision in New Orleans v. Citizens' Bank, 167 U. S. 371, 396-398, 42 L. ed. 202, 210, 211, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 905. This was replied to by saying that the contrary rule prevailed in Tennessee. That in that state, unlike Louisiana a dispute over a tax imposed one year was over a different subject-matter, and a decision of the one dispute was not the thing adjudged when the other came to be settled. As this was not a Federal question, the courts of the United States would give in respect thereto the same force and effect to the judgments of the state courts thereon that the state courts gave to their own judgments, and they would give no greater force or effect thereto.

It was accordingly held that the decisions relied on were not res judicata, and hence that Memphis was not estopped from taxing the bank in the way and manner and upon the subject contested. Union & Planters' Bank v. Memphis, 49 C. C. A. 455, 111 Fed. 561.

b. Miscellaneous.

A section in a railroad consolidation act (one of the constituent companies being exempt from ordinary taxation) providing that a statement of the actual cost of the road shall be filed with the secretary of state, and that whenever the net earnings of the consolidated company over expenses and interest amount to 6 per cent per annum upon its capital stock, it shall pay a tax annually to the state of a specified percentage upon the cost, and such other state tax as may be assessed from time to time by a general law, applicable to all railroads that the legislature shall have power to tax at the time of enacting such law or laws,—exempts the company from all taxes until both mentioned contingencies happen, and from other taxation after the earnings bring it under the percentage tax until the legislature passes a law applying to all railroads. State, Camden & B. R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Cook, 32 N. J. L. 338.

Although a municipal ordinance imposing an annual license fee for each car run in the city by street railway companies may not apply to, or be enforced against, two of such companies in consequence of prior contract obligations between them and the city, this does not affect its validity as to another such company whose charter expressly makes it subject to such a license fee. New York v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 97 N. Y. 275.

Provisions in corporate charters, one that so much of the real estate of the corporation as is occupied for hospital purposes, and all of its personal property, shall be exempt from taxation, and the other that the real and personal property of the corporation to the extent that it is by its act of incorporation authorized to hold the same, is hereby exempted from taxation, exempt both of such corporations from the payment upon legacies to them of any tax under a collateral inheritance tax act which exempts from its operation societies, corporations, and institutions exempted by law from taxation. To entitle a corporation to the benefit of this exception, it is not necessary that it should have complete immunity from taxation upon all property which it has or may acquire. Re Vassar, 127 N. Y. 1, 27 N. E. 394, Reversing 58 Hun, 378, 12 N. Y. Supp. 203, and Overruling Re Keech, 26 N. Y. S. R. 433, 7 N. Y. Supp. 331, 32 N. Y. S. R. 227, 11 N. Y. Supp. 265; Re Lenox, 31 N. Y. S. R. 959, 9 N. Y. Supp. 895; Re Vanderbilt, 2 Connolly, 319, 10 N. Y. Supp. 239-242.

No such exemption accrues to a foreign corporation, nor obtains by virtue of a statute conferring a limited privilege to take and hold property in the state. Re Prime, 136 N. Y. 347, 18 L. R. A. 713, 32 N. E. 1091.

A statute amendatory of an act incorporating an omnibus company, which enables it to construct and operate a street railway in a city on obtaining the consent of the municipal authorities, and which provides that if such consent be given it shall be subject to all the restrictions, limitations, and conditions prescribed in another statute passed to authorize such authorities to grant the privilege of con-

in constructing the same; and it shall be the duty of the tax collector in every county, in each and every year, to give to said company a receipt in full for the amount of said taxes upon receiving from said company an affidavit, made by the president or cashier of said company, that the amount of said taxes have actually and in good faith been paid and applied by said company during the year in payment of the debts incurred, or money borrowed as aforesaid, and which receipt so given shall be in full of all taxes, county, state, and municipal, to which said company shall be subject: Provided, however, that whenever the profits of said company shall enable it to declare and pay to the stockholders an annual dividend of 8 per cent upon its capital stock over and above the payment of its debts and liabilities, then the appropriation of the taxes aforesaid shall cease, and said taxes shall be paid by said company to the tax collector, to be by him paid over as required by law." That act was passed in 1870, after the Constitution of 1869 (§ 13, art. 12, and § 20, art. 12) had been adopted; and it is expressly decided in Lambert's Case, 70 Miss. 786, 789, 13 So. 33, that this was "a thin disguise to evade constitutional restraint apprehended to be contained in the section . . . [§ 13, article 12, of said Constitution];" and the Lambert Case further declares—what is manifest—that the pretended exemption was irrepealable on the face of said section. Unquestionably, said 21st section did provide for an irrepealable exemption on its face, and we hold it, therefore, to have been in violation of § 13, art. 12, and § 20, art. 12, Const. 1869.

The case of Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56

structing street railways within the city (such other statute providing for the imposition of a specific tax on the gross earnings of such railways in lieu and in full of all city taxes and impositions of every nature upon such railways, their equipments, stock, and appendages),—does not confer any right or benefit to such restricted, limited, or substituted taxation. Dauphin & L. Streets R. Co. v. Kennerly, 74 Ala. 583.

A railroad charter subjecting the grantee to liability for an annual municipal license fee for each car run, the same as those paid, at the time it was granted, by other railways operating in the streets of the same city, when a number of similar companies in that city pay a stated sum, and one such company a much less sum, and a few others nothing, must be construed as making the grantee of such charter liable for the highest license fee paid by any similar company in such city; because of the well-settled rule that any ambiguity in a public grant must be resolved against the grantee and in favor of the public, and because, too, any different construction would exempt the corporation altogether. New York v. Broadway & S. Ave. R. Co. 97 N. Y. 275.

Under statutes for the incorporation and consolidation of railroad companies, the first providing that all chattels purchased with the corporate funds, and all the works constructed and property acquired under the charter, shall be vested in the stockholders forever in proportion to their respective shares, and deemed personal estate, and for fifteen years be exempt from any public charge or tax whatever, after which the legislature shall be at liberty to impose a tax not greater than 25 cents a share annually whenever the annual profits exceed 6 per cent; and the second providing that the stockholders of a railroad chartered by an adjoining state, thereby merged in the domestic corporation, are by such act constituted stockholders in the domestic company, with the same rights, powers, privileges, and franchises in proportion to the number of shares as if original subscribers to stock in the domestic company,—the legislature has reserved by contract the right to tax, after fifteen years, the consolidated road up to 25 cents a share annually, not only upon the original stock of the domestic company, or in proportion to the mileage of the consolidated company within the state, but also upon the whole number of shares in the consolidated corporation, whether owned by residents or non-residents, as the right so to tax rests in con- 60 L. R. A.

tract, and not upon the taxing power. State ex rel. Bain v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 52 Fed. 450.

When, by a statute passed to create a new contract with a consolidated railroad corporation to take the place of the charter of one of its constituents, whereby the state had bound itself to issue state bonds at the rate of $10,000 a mile as fast as certain sections of the road were completed (an obligation it had not met), it is provided that, in lieu of such bond issues, there is granted to the consolidated railroad certain plats of the public lands for each mile of road already completed or subsequently to be constructed according to the charter; and that such lands and the certificates issued therefor shall be exempted from all state, county, municipal, and other taxes for twenty-five years; and, also, that the consolidated railroad company, its successors, and its and their capital stock, rights, franchises, railroads built and to be built, rolling stock, and all other property then or thereafter owned or possessed by said company or its successors shall be exempted from all state, county, municipal, and other taxes for the same period (except county and municipal taxes in such counties, cities, and towns as have donated their bonds to aid in the construction of said railroad), with a proviso that the exemptions shall not apply to the lands or railroads of the other constituent, or to the franchise, roadbed, rolling stock, or any property acquired from such other constituent,—a county which has donated its bonds to aid the construction of the second constituent road, but not that of the one which held the charter superseded by the statute, nor yet the consolidated road, is not within the exception, and not entitled to tax the road. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Anderson County, 59 Tex. 654.

And money in the hands of a receiver of such road, earnings of the second constituent only, is not exempt, as it is within the terms of such proviso. Campbell v. Wiggins, 85 Tex. 424, 21 S. W. 599, Affirming 2 Tex. Civ. App. 1, 20 S. W. 730.

An exemption given by a railroad charter of the capital stock of the corporation from all state and county taxes gives immunity from road taxes, in Missouri. State ex rel. Love v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 101 Mo. 120, 13 S. W. 406.

And such a charter exemption, so far as county taxes are concerned, was not impaired nor affected by a subsequent law granting lands to such railroad company, and providing that

Miss. 40, expressly held that the legislature had no power to grant an irrevocable exemption, and, under that decision, the exemption claimed under this section is manifestly unconstitutional. Section 13, art. 12, Const. 1869, is in these words: "The property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals." Section 20 is in these words: "Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state; all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as directed by law." Mississippi Mills v. Cook decided that the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit was and should remain subject to taxation. It expressly held that, while an exemption might be granted, yet it might at any time be repealed by the legislature, and, further, that no exemption could be granted to any private corporation for pecuniary profit by a special act extending a special exemption to that special corporation alone; but that, in order to make any such exemption valid, it must be extended to all corporations for pecuniary profit of the same class and in the same situation. And the precise exemption asserted in that case was asserted distinctly under the acts of April 1, 1872, and of April 17, 1873, amendatory thereof, set out at pages 42 and 43 of 56 Miss. The Mississippi Mills did not claim that it had a valid exemption by virtue of a special act granting such special exemption to the Mississippi Mills alone, but that it had such exemption in common with all other factories similarly situated by virtue of said general law. The exemption set up here under the 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern charter is wholly different. The claim here is that this particular railroad is entitled to this special such company should pay into the state treasury a sum of money equal to the state tax upon other real and personal property of like value for that year, upon the actual value of the roadbed and other property of the company. State ex rel. Trammel v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 101 Mo. 136, 13 S. W. 505.

c. Implied repeals.

It is the well-settled doctrine derived from all the authorities, that laws special and local in their application are not deemed repealed by general legislation, except upon the clearest manifestation of a purpose by the legislature thus to effect their repeal; and, ordinarily, an express repeal by some intelligible reference to the special act is necessary to accomplish that result.

This doctrine has been invoked and applied to negative the implied repeal of corporate charter tax exemption provisions by subsequently enacted general revenue laws. Com. v. Richmond & P. R. Co. 81 Va. 355; State v. Nashville Sav. Bank, 16 Lea, 111; Com. v. Pottsville Water Co. 94 Pa. 516; Com. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. 164 Pa. 252, 30 Atl. 145.

A condition in a railroad consolidation act granting immunity to the amalgamated corporation from taxation save such tax as may be assessed from time to time by a general law applying to all railroads over which the legislature shall have power for that purpose at the time it enacts such law or laws is not satisfied by a general revenue tax law enacting that all private corporations of the state, except banks and others expressly exempted from taxation by their charters or other contracts with the state, shall be taxed at the full amount of their paid-in capital stock and accumulated surplus. State, Camden & B. R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Cook, 32 N. J. L. 338.

And a provision in the charter of a street railroad company, that as soon as it declares dividends equal to 7 per cent per annum, and so long as it pays such dividends, it shall pay the state annually a tax of 1 per cent upon the cost of its road, and that no other tax or impost shall be levied or raised from such company by virtue of any law of the state, saves such company from all taxation under a law applying to all corporations except those expressly exempted from taxation by virtue of their charters or of other contracts with the state. Douglass v. State, 34 N. J. L. 485.

But while the undoubted rules of statutory construction are that implied repeals are not favored, and are only given effect when, by 60 L. R. A.

reason of manifest inconsistency, the two acts cannot both stand; and that a general act does not repeal a special one upon the same subject, even where the inconsistency between them is manifest and considerable,—in Pennsylvania both of these rules are to be read in the light of a line of cases concerned with taxation, holding that a general taxing statute does repeal by implication a special one upon the same subject. The rules are relaxed and modified by two principles of state policy, viz.: (1) That the state cannot permanently surrender, although temporarily it may suspend or limit, the taxing power in particular instances; and (2) that such power may be, and is, resumed by a general statute insufficiently apt inclusive words, even if it lacks repealing language. All, provided, of course, that no specific constitutional provision or definite contract intervenes to control. Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 1 Dauphin Co. Rep. 257.

The authorities cited to sustain this were all cases decided anterior to Com. v. Pottsville Water Co. 94 Pa. 516, and Com. v. Philadelphia & E. R. Co. 164 Pa. 252, 30 Atl. 145, which reaffirmed the general rule, and none of them involved an irrevocable contract. It is not necessary to discuss them at length.

As a general statute requiring foreign insurance companies to report semiannually the premiums they receive within the enacting state, and at the same time pay a percentage thereof into the state treasury in lieu of all other taxes, unlike a corporate charter containing a similar provision, does not constitute an irrevocable contract, therefore, the enactment of a subsequent statute levying a direct tax of $200 annually upon the privilege of establishing an insurance agency in a given taxing district for foreign insurance companies repeals, without express verbiage, the clause in the earlier act making the payment required in lieu of all other taxes. Home Ins. Co. v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 4 Lea, 644. Freeman, J., dissented upon the ground that the doctrine of implied repeal did not exist in Tennessee, because the state Constitution required all repealing acts to recite in their caption the title or substance of the law repealed.

d. Acts that impair.

In the case of a mere gratuitous exemption of a corporation from taxation there is only a suspension of the sovereign right to tax all property, which the state may at will resume, and which it does resume whenever it seems fit to impose a tax upon the property. But, where exemption, which it is conceded is not now, and never was, extended to all other railroads similarly situated in this state. And, further, this exemption is irrevocable on its face, and the Mississippi Mills Case decided that no irrevocable exemption was constitutional. It is certainly obvious from these considerations alone that Mississippi Mills v. Cook is no authority to sustain the exemption set up here. It is further clear that the constitutionality, under the Constitution of 1869, of a legislative grant of exemption to private corporations for pecuniary profit if it embraced all of the same class—the property of individuals being at the same time taxed—was not argued, considered, or decided in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, but was conceded by the attorney general and the judges who wrote the majority opinions. One of the vices of the decision in Mississippi Mills v. Cook is that it did not hold that all the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit was required to be taxed by the terms of the Constitution (art. 12, §§ 13, 20) just as and when the property of individuals was. Instead of doing this, the court decided that all such property was free from taxation, unless the legislature expressly subjected it to taxation, even though the property of private individuals was taxed, inverting the rule of the Constitution. It was certainly an idle performance to declare, as the court did declare, that the whole effect of the constitutional provision was to render the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit liable to taxation. That everybody knew, and to so limit the constitutional declaration was to emasculate it. More than thirty-five years had intervened between the the exemption is given upon a valuable consideration fixed and accepted by the state, there is a contract between the state and the corporation. If the legislature has the constitutional power to make it, and the corporation acquires vested rights which may not be impaired or violated. Citizens' Bank v. Bouny, 32 La. Ann. 239.

When a railroad holds an irrevocable charter giving it a special rate and subject of taxation, and expressly providing that no other or further tax or imposition shall be levied or imposed upon said company, it cannot be subjected to taxation under a subsequent general railroad tax law applying to all railroads in the state, and designed as a substitute for all existing methods of taxation, commuted or otherwise, until and unless it is by its own action and consent brought within the terms of a section in such statute which provides that corporations having such irrevocable rights may, within a stated time and in a specified manner, surrender their claims to exemption, and accept the provisions of the new law. Pending affirmative action upon its part, such railroad must be taxed as theretofore. State, United R. & Canal Co., Prosecutors, v. Railroad Taxation Comrs. 37 N. J. L. 240.

When a railroad charter provides that the road, with all the works, improvements, and profits, and all the machinery of transportation, are vested in the company and its successors forever, and that the shares of its capital stock are to be deemed and considered personal estate and exempt from the imposition of any tax or burden; and there has been reserved to the legislature by Constitution or statute no right to alter or repeal such charter; nor is there any limitation or restriction upon the power of the legislature to grant exemptions from taxation.—a statute laying a tax upon the gross receipts of such railroad, whether regarded as one imposing a tax upon property or a franchise tax, in so far as such receipts are derived from the operation of the road and business or property necessary thereto, is invalid by virtue of the contract clause of the Federal Constitution. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 48 Md. 49.

When a state legislature has, in the charter of a railroad corporation, plainly declared in unambiguous terms that if the corporation would complete the internal improvement it was organized to make, its property and the shares of its stockholders should be forever exempt from taxation, subsequent laws imposing taxes upon the franchise and rolling stock of 60 L. R. A.

the company, and upon real estate appurtenant to and forming part of its general property necessary to be used in the successful operation of its business, impair the obligation of the contract in the charter, and are, for that reason, unconstitutional. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 264, 20 L. ed. 568.

This is followed by a like decision in a case of kindred character, the same in essential features; the only difference being in the extent of the exemption. Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Reid, 13 Wall. 269, 20 L. ed. 570.

A statute imposing a tax upon the gross receipts of such a railroad is unconstitutional and void for impairing the obligation of such a charter contract. Worth v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 89 N. C. 291, 45 Am. Rep. 679; Worth v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 89 N. C. 301.

A state statute enacted after the creation of a railroad debt and the issue of interest bearing bonds evidencing the same, which requires the debtor railroad (in common with many other corporations), before paying the stipulated interest upon such bonds, to withhold from the bondholders 5 per cent of such interest and pay it over to the state, is, so far as such bonds are held by nonresident aliens, and so far as such interest is payable to citizens of other states,—at least, when both the principal and interest of such bonds are payable outside of the taxing state,—an impairment of the contract between the debtor and creditor, and therefore unconstitutional and void. State Tax on Foreign-held Bonds, 15 Wall. 300, sub nom. Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 21 L. ed. 179.

In the case immediately following this,—Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. 326, note, 21 L. ed. 189,—Davis, Clifford, Miller, and Hunt, JJ., dissented. In their opinion the tax was valid and bound both the railroads and their creditors, because the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in the case of Maltby v. Reading & C. R. Co. 52 Pa. 140, had held of an earlier statute (1844) that it authorized the taxation of railroad bonded debts, and, inasmuch as that statute was in force when the bonds of the railroads then before the court were issued, its provisions were to be regarded, by implication of law, as a part and parcel of the contract embodied in the bonds and their coupons; and when the state could reach any property within its borders there was no constitutional restraint upon its power to tax it, although it was owned by foreigners.

The state of Missouri, in 1865, adopted a new Constitution, and, in connection with it, previous Constitution of the state and the Constitution of 1869. When that previous Constitution was adopted—in 1832—the state was young, and had had little experience with the grasping demands of corporations for grants of exclusive privileges; but the experience of more than thirty-five years had taught it wisdom in this regard,—wisdom learned long prior by older commonwealths like California and Iowa, from the Constitution of which latter state the provisions of the Constitution of 1869 in question were doubtless borrowed; and so § 13 of article 12 was put in the organic law of the land, beyond the reach of legislative control, for the express purpose of formulating a fundamentally great line of public policy prohibiting any difference in the exercise of the taxing power between the property of individuals and the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit. The court in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss., at pages 51, 52, looked too narrowly at the mere word "subject." It should have taken broadly the whole section into view, and deduced from all its terms the meaning of the provision. Judge Campbell in Beek v. Allen, 58 Miss. 177, most wisely said: "Subtlety and refinement and astuteness are not admissible to explain away an expression of the sovereign will. . . . The framers of the Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have intended the words employed in that sense most likely to arise from them on first reading them." This is the doctrine announced by Cooley and Story, and our construction of the meaning of § 13, to wit, that it required the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit to be taxed just as—an ordinance relating to railroads. This ordinance provided, in substance, that there should be levied and collected from the Pacific Railroad Company, the North Missouri Railroad Company, and the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad Company, an annual tax of 10 per cent for two years, and afterwards one of 15 per cent, of all their gross receipts from freights and fares, to be assessed and collected in St. Louis in the same manner as other state taxes were assessed and collected. This tax was devoted to the payment of the principal and interest of bonds issued or guaranteed by the state for the construction of the roads, and was restricted to such end, and was to cease when the bonds were retired. It was payable in cash or in other bonds or obligations of the state. And if the companies defaulted in paying, or refused to pay, such tax, the legislature was directed to enact a law providing for the sale of their franchises, roads, and property to satisfy the claims of the state. The railroads contested the constitutionality of this ordinance. It was, first, a question whether the ordinance was an exercise of the taxing power; second, whether it impaired the obligation of a contract between the state and the railroads contained in a previous statute, whereby, when the roads were unfinished, and in order to bring about their completion, a large additional bond issue was authorized to be secured by a first-mortgage lien, and which provided for the appointment of a state commissioner to receive the gross earnings and apply them, (1) to the operating expenses, (2) to his own salary, (3) to the new bonds, and afterward to other classes, of which the 6th was the state bonds, issued or guaranteed, and mentioned in the ordinance. The state supreme court held that the ordinance was an exercise of the taxing power, and that, although the statute authorizing the new bond issue and appointment of a commissioner to take and apply the gross receipts was a contract, it was one that did not affect the taxing power. North Missouri R. Co. v. Maguire, 49 Mo. 490, 8 Am. Rep. 141.

The Pacific Railroad Company set up the additional claim that the Missouri statute of December 25, 1852, § 12 of which exempted that road from taxation for two years after it was completed and in operation, unless it should before that period elapsed declare a dividend, constituted a special contract with it which the constitutional ordinance impaired. The state court held that there was no difference in principle between this case and the other, and that, for the reasons given in the other, the same judgment must follow. Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 51 Mo. 142.

The cases were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, where, by a divided court, the last-cited case was reversed, while the other was affirmed. Hunt, J., writing for the majority, held that the act of December 25, 1852, § 12, constituted a contract between the state and the Pacific Railroad Company, exempting the road for two years beyond its completion, unless it should sooner declare a dividend; and, as the time limit had not expired, nor the contingency happened, the constitutional ordinance could not be enforced, because it impaired the obligation of that contract. He replied to the argument that the ordinance was not so much a taxing act as a law for the collection of a debt due the state from the railroads, with vigor. The ordinance, he said, was either the imposition of a tax, or it was an act of high-handed violence; a forcible seizure of private property without law or authority; an act which, if committed by an individual, would amount to robbery. Waite, Ch. J., concurred in the conclusion of the majority for the reason that, if the ordinance really imposed a tax, it was an impairment of the contract made by the act of 1852 with the Pacific Railroad Company, but he leaned to the debt-collection theory, notwithstanding his colleague's contemptuous and wrathful denunciation, and that even on that theory the ordinance must fall, because it impaired the contract the state had made in the act of 1864 authorizing the new bond issue and postponing its own claims. Clifford and Miller, JJ., dissented upon the ground that the asserted contracts were not broad enough to protect the road against the exaction commanded by the ordinance. Pacific R. Co. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. 36, 22 L. ed. 282.

The North Missouri Railroad Company had no special contract with the state for its particular exemption, and a majority of the court (Waite, Ch. J., dissenting) agreed in affirming its liability to pay according to the terms of the constitutional ordinance. North Missouri R. Co. v. Maguire, 20 Wall. 46, 22 L. ed. 287.

Whatever immunity the St. Louis & Iron Mountain Railroad Company had disappeared on foreclosure. Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. ed. 938.

The attitude of the chief justice in these cases commands respect. Whether the constitutional ordinance of Missouri be regarded as "the same as"—the property of individuals, so that one would not be exempt and the other taxed, is the identical construction placed upon the same words by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the supreme courts of Alabama, Arkansas, California, Florida, and Iowa. We prefer now to distinctly align ourselves with the Supreme Court of the United States on this important question, and overrule Mississippi Mills v. Cook in so far as it held that the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit was not, by Const. 1869, art. 12, §§ 13, 20, expressly directed to be taxed just as the property of individuals. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court to which we refer are as follows: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 248, 27 L. ed. 924, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 475,

The decisions of the state supreme courts to which we have referred are as follows: Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 635; People v. McCreery, 34 Cal. 432; Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289; Palmes v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19 Fla. 231 (which collates the Constitutions of Wisconsin, Missouri, Illinois, Kansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, and Louisiana). In Mobile v. Stonecall Ins. Co. 53 Ala. 570, Judge Brickell in a most masterly opinion says: "The constitutional provision supposed to have been offended by the enactments under which the appellee claims immunity from a tax act, or as a law to collect the claims of the state in advance of other creditors, it was none the less an act of perfidy to those who invested in the new bonds upon its pledged faith that the gross earnings of the railroads next above the operating expenses and salary of the state receiver should be applied to repay their loans before the state touched the receipts for itself.

A state law imposing taxes for past years upon a railroad, which was not, although liable to be, assessed during that time, cannot be enforced against property which the road then had, that has in the meantime passed by sale and purchase to a new owner without any lien upon it for taxes having been reserved. The legislature has no power thus to impair the contract between vendor and vendee, nor to take the property of one to pay the debt of another. State v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 203.

When the legislature in chartering a bank, fixes a price to be paid by the corporation to the state for the franchise, in the form of an annual tax upon its capital, and reserves no right to vary it, a subsequent statute imposing another and different tax upon the corporate franchise is unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract. Atty. Gen. v. Bank of Charlotte, 57 N. C. (4 Jones Eq.) 287.

It having been settled by repeated adjudications, both of the state courts, and of the United States Supreme Court, that statutes attempting to tax a bank upon the shares of its capital stock either as a corporation directly liable or with a remedy over by claim for reimbursement from its stockholders, are void for impairing the obligation of the contract in a corporate charter, expressed by the words: "And the capital of said bank shall be exempt from any tax laid by the state, or by any parish or body politic under the authority of the state, during the continuance of its charter,"—so as to be no longer an open question,—declared the Louisiana supreme court in 1901,—the latest attempt to tax the shares of such a bank, embodied in a statute of that state, enacting that, in the event that any national or state bank, banking firm, or company, is, by the decisions of the courts, held not liable to pay taxes on the shares of its shareholders, then the taxes shall be collected from and paid by each shareholder on the share or shares held by him; and each shareholder failing to pay the same may be proceeded against by a rule to produce, and by all other proceedings provided for to collect taxes on movable property,—must fall for 60 L. R. A.

the same reason. Penrose v. Chaffraix, 106 La. 250, 30 So. 718.

A municipal ordinance imposing a penalty of $50 upon the proprietor of every passenger railroad car running within stated limits in the city, who should not procure a license from the mayor for each car and pay annually therefor a fee of the same amount; and which lays no duty upon the railroads except to pay the money; and which applies to lines already enfranchised to operate in the city under municipal grants not reserving power to exact such penalty or require such license,—is a revenue measure, and not a police regulation,—a tax, not a license; and as such is void for contravening the constitutional prohibition against impairing contracts. New York v. Second Ave. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 261.

Such an exaction is not an exercise of the power of municipal regulation reserved in the franchise grant, but is in derogation of contract rights,—is simply an attempt by one party to revoke a provision inserted for the benefit of the other. New York v. Third Ave. R. Co. 33 N. Y. 42.

When a city has by ordinance granted a telegraph company permission to erect its poles and string its wires in the city streets, in consideration of furnishing the city with certain free telephonic communications and facilities, it cannot, after the company has accepted and installed an expensive and valuable plant, exact an additional consideration for the privileges enjoyed; and an ordinance requiring such company annually to pay, in addition to taxes on its property and license taxes on its business, a specific sum for each pole set up or used in a designated district for the privilege of entering upon, using, and permanently occupying the streets, ways, and places of the city, under penalty of removal of the poles if such payment is not made, is in violation of its contract, and void. New Orleans v. Great Southern Teleph. & Teleg. Co. 40 La. Ann. 41, 3 So. 533.

A case without a parallel, here in point, divided the supreme court of Iowa in 1874. Each of the four members of the court differed with all his colleagues. The action was brought by the city of Dubuque to recover of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, taxes for the year 1871 upon the railroad track, right of way, certain real estate owned and used, rolling stock, coal, oil, and other supplies belonging to the railroad and located or kept within the city limits. By the judgment below the railroad was charged with all these taxes, except the taxation the appellant seeks to recover has a history which must be consulted in determining its just interpretation. . . . Its purpose was not an adaptation only of the organic law to the changed political condition of the people, and to conform it to the new relations springing from the amendments of the Federal Constitution, and the conditions imposed by congressional enactment. It was intended also to cure defects time had developed in former Constitutions, —to narrow and restrain legislative power in the instances experience had shown it most liable to abuse. Under former Constitutions the taxing power was not defined, qualified, or restrained by any other provision than the simple declaration: 'All lands liable to taxation in this state shall be taxed in proportion to their value.' . . . There cannot be a just interpretation (an interpretation which will consummate the intent of the people in the adoption of these and other constitutional provisions) which is not deduced, not only from their language, but from their history,—from the causes to which they owe origin and the mischief they were intended to remedy. In respect to the Constitution of the United States, it is said 'the safest rule of interpretation is to look to the nature and objects of the particular powers, duties, and rights, with all the lights and aid of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the ends proposed.' . . . In the creation of the greater part, if not all, of the private moneyed or commercial corporations which were created prior to 1861, a commutation those upon its passenger station and rolling stock, and both parties appealed. The judgment was affirmed, as against the railroad, by the concurrence of three judges, and as against the city, because the judges stood two and two. It had previously been decided that railroad property, like all other property in the city, was liable to municipal taxation; whereupon the legislature enacted a statute providing that every railroad company which had paid all taxes on gross earnings under a former law should be released from all other taxes which may have been levied upon its roadbed, right of way, rolling stock, and necessary buildings, and forbidding the collection of any such taxes for prior years, for state, county, municipal, or any other purpose. This statute was enacted after the taxes sued for had been assessed, levied, and become due, and the railroad relied upon it as a complete defense to the action. Beck, J., argued that the taxes had become a debt the railroad was under obligation to pay, a chose in action, a piece of property belonging to the city, entitled to the same protection as other property, and the legislature had no power to take it away. The statute in question, in his opinion, deprived the city of Dubuque of its property without due process of law, and it impaired the obligation of the contract which the law implied upon the part of a taxpayer to pay taxes legally assessed and due. He concluded, therefore, that the statute was unconstitutional and void. Miller, Ch. J., was of the opinion that the statute was unconstitutional because it violated a section of the state Constitution which declared that the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit should be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals. He refused, deeming it unnecessary, to express an opinion upon the question whether the city had such a vested interest in the taxes levied upon the railroad at the time the act of release passed that the legislature could not constitutionally enact such law. Cole, J., dissented all along the line, because he held that the former decisions holding the railroads liable at all to municipal taxes were unsound; and that the provision in the earlier statute imposing the gross-earnings tax, that it should be in lieu of all taxes for any and all purposes, had been wrongly limited to taxes for state and county purposes alone. He had protested against such a construction at the time, and he protested still. The legislation sub judice merely corrected a mistake, either of the legislature in the former act, or of the court in construing 60 L. R. A.

it. This could not be unconstitutional. He denied that a municipal corporation had any vested right in an uncollected tax laid by general law for a general public purpose, which would or could prevent the legislature from altering or repealing that law or abolishing the tax. He insisted that the provision in the state Constitution, that corporate property should be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, was not equivalent to a command that it should be actually taxed. Day, J., concurred generally with Beck, J., in his conclusions, but expressed no opinion upon the proposition that the city had a vested right in the taxes. Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56.

e. Acts that do not impair.

Mr. Justice Holmes, who has but just taken his seat in the United States Supreme Court, takes occasion to remark, in a very recent case decided by that tribunal (Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 180, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277, Affirming 171 N. Y. 682, 64 N. E. 1118, 69 App. Div. 127, 74 N. Y. Supp. 508), sustaining a tax imposed under the New York collateral inheritance tax act, laid upon money deposited temporarily in a trust company by a nonresident and remaining on deposit at the time of his death, which occurred without the state, that, "in the case at bar the law imposing the tax was in force before the deposit was made, and it did not impair the obligation of the contract, if a tax otherwise lawful ever can be said to have that effect." Doubtless, this language was not intended to be taken in its broad and literal sense, although one does not readily perceive in the context any limitation upon the natural import of the words. The discussion thus far has shown to how great an extent the remark needs qualifying.

A contract in the charter of a corporation is not impaired, in the constitutional sense, when the corporate property and franchise are condemned and taken upon due compensation in the exercise of the power of eminent domain. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535.

Unless a corporate charter contains an express contract against taxation, the company takes it subject to the same right in the state to tax the privileges granted and the corporate property that applies to all other privileges and property. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 939; Nashville, M. & S. Turnp. Co. v. White, 92 Tenn. 369, 22 S. W. 75; New of taxation was a prominent feature of the charter. . . . Entire or partial exemption from taxation temporarily has been frequently granted corporations formed to pursue branches of industry, the encouragement of which it was believed a wise public policy required. All exemptions from taxation necessarily increase the burdens imposed on the property not exempt, and are directly injurious to the taxpayer. The incidental benefits which it is supposed may result to him, in common with the community at large, are speculative, and not often a compensation for the immediate injury sustained. Invidious exemptions or discriminations, by which the property of an individual, or of a corporation, is relieved from bearing a just proportion of the common burden taxation is intended to discharge, are violative of the equality of right of the citizen, which is a fundamental principle of our institutions. To prevent any exemption or discrimination in favor of corporations, to subject their property to the same rate of taxation to which the property of individuals of the same kind is subject, is the purpose of the constitutional provision clearly expressed: 'The property of corporations now existing, or hereafter created, shall forever be subject to taxation, the same as property of individuals,' etc. The argument of appellee that it was intended only to reserve to the legislature the power of subjecting corporate property to the taxation imposed on individuals, and to avoid the introduction into charters of irrepealable exemptions or discriminations, cannot be supported. . . . Reading these constitutional provisions in the light of their history, and with a due regard to the words in

A foreign insurance company, licensed by a state to do business therein, and paying the state for the privilege a percentage of the gross amount of premiums it receives in the state, and, also, paying a city in which it does business, pursuant to an ordinance thereof, another percentage tax upon its receipts in such city, may, nevertheless, when the state and the city have not stipulated not to impose other taxes, be subjected to a further and an additional license tax of a specific sum fixed by municipal ordinance without the latter exaction being repugnant to the contract clause in the Federal Constitution. Home Ins. Co. v. Augusta, 93 U. S. 116, 23 L. ed. 825.

The assessment by the authorities of a city of a street railway for state and county taxes is not vitiated by its being nontaxable for city purposes by virtue of a contract with the city to pay, in lieu thereof, a percentage of its gross earnings. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809.

The fact that a street railway corporation has been granted a franchise to operate its road upon certain streets of a city by municipal ordinance does not relieve it from paying a municipal license tax subsequently imposed by city ordinance upon the business of street railroads, nor its manager from the penalty incurred by its failure to pay. Wyandotte v. Corrigan, 35 Kan. 21, 10 Pac. 99.

Municipal bonds are taxable as a part of the personal property of a resident taxpayer for local, as well as state, purposes, and by the city assessors the same as all other property within their jurisdiction, whether belonging to corporate or individual owners, and without in anywise impairing the obligation of the city upon its contract with the bondholders. People ex rel. Niagara F. Ins. Co. v. New York City & County Tax & A. Comrs. 76 N. Y. 64.

This case is to be distinguished from that of Murray v. Charleston, 96 U. S. 432, 24 L. ed. 760, which involved a special tax laid by municipal ordinance upon city bonds, to be deducted from the interest accruing thereon, and which in effect reduced such interest by a third.

A statute passed several years after a foreign building and loan association has done business in the enacting state, and has outstanding a great number of contracts with members, whereby it is required to pay annually into the state treasury 2 per cent of its gross receipts from business within the state, is 60 L. not objectionable upon the ground that it impairs the obligation of such contracts. Southern Bldg. & L. Assn. v. Norman, 98 Ky. 204, 31 L. R. A. 41, 32 S. W. 952.

Inasmuch as all contracts are inherently subject to the paramount power of the sovereign to exact from the fruits thereof such sums by way of taxation as may properly be collected for public purposes, a law taxing the gross earnings of a railroad which has leased its line to another company for a stipulated rental, and which requires the lessee company to withhold such tax from the rent and pay it over to the state, is not a law impairing the obligation of the contract contained in the lease. Vermont & C. R. Co. v. Vermont C. R. Co. 63 Vt. 1, 10 L. R. A. 562; 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 488, 21 Atl. 262, 731.

A state law requiring a domestic corporation, when paying interest on its bonded debt, to withhold from the bondholders and pay over to the state a specific state tax, does not impair the obligation of the contract between the corporation and its bond creditors, in so far, at least, as the bond holders reside and the bonds are actually held within the state. Com. v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 129 Pa. 429, 18 Atl. 406, 410.

Nor is a state law of that character open to such an objection when it applies to all corporations, but exacts the tax only from interest payments to the resident holders of scrip, bonds, or certificates representing the funded debt. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 150 Pa. 234, 24 Atl. 609; Com. v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 150 Pa. 245, 24 Atl. 599.

Neither does such a law, in application to a railroad corporation chartered by another state and operating a part of its line in the taxing state, being neither empowered by its charter nor commanded thereby to act as an assessor or tax collector, impair the obligation of the contract between its home state and such foreign railroad corporation expressed in its charter. Com. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 150 Pa. 234, 24 Atl. 609.

A statute providing for the taxation of mortgages to the mortgagee, and for deducting the par value of mortgages from the value of the land on which they rest in assessing the mortgagor or landowner, is not invalid by bond impairment of the contract evidenced by bond and mortgage executed before its enactment and at a time when the landowner was subjected to the whole tax. Dundee Mortg. Trust Investment Co. v. School Dist. No. 1, 10 Sawy. 52, 19 Fed. 359.

which they are expressed, it is impossible for us to doubt that it was not competent for the general assembly, in the imposition of taxes, to distinguish or discriminate in favor of corporate property subject to taxation. If property of a particular kind is subjected to taxation, and owned by a corporation, it must bear the rate of taxation imposed on individuals. While the Constitution inhibits the exemption or discrimination in favor of corporations, it equally inhibits a discrimination against them. Equality in bearing a common burden, which is natural, right, and equity, is secured alike to the corporation and to the citizen. The Constitution of Iowa contains a provision identical in meaning, if not in words, with the provision of the Constitution of 1868, under consideration. It reads: 'The property of all corporations for pecuniary profit shall be subject to taxation, the same as that of individuals.' [Iowa Const. art. 8, § 2.] In Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 635, it was the subject of construction, and was declared mandatory, requiring the legislature to provide for taxation of the property of corporations for pecuniary profit the same as that of individuals. A statute releasing railroad companies from certain taxation to which individuals were subject was declared violative of it. The court says: 'What are we to understand to be intended by the language, "the same as that of individuals?" We need not determine whether this language requires that corporate property shall be taxed in the same manner as that of natural persons. It seems, however, quite clear that it was intended by this language to require the legislature to impose the burdens of taxation

In Com. v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Dauphin Co. Rep. 40, it is said that a tax upon the capital stock of a foreign transportation company doing business in Pennsylvania, apportioned by the mileage method, does not violate the clause of the Federal Constitution forbidding any state to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts; but the report leaves one altogether in the dark as to why it should have been supposed that it did, or as to what contract was supposed to be impaired by such a tax.

A tax upon the shares of stock of stockholders in a corporation, resting upon a different subject and another personality from a tax upon the capital of the corporation, is not a tax upon exempt state and municipal bonds in which a part of the corporate capital has been invested, and so the failure of the assessors to make deductions proportionate to the amount of such bonds does not render the tax obnoxious to the contract clause in the United States Constitution. Parker v. Sun Ins. Co. 42 La. Ann. 1172, 8 So. 618.

A corporation whose charter exempts from all taxation whatever 3,000 shares of its stock, or whatever part thereof is required to construct its works, except that when its net annual income exceeds 6 per cent the excess may be taxed for state purposes, is taxable when its income above operating expenses is more than 6 per cent on the cost of its works, although a part of the excess has been consumed in making needed repairs and the rest in enlarging and extending the plant. The expense of current repairs is part of and may be deducted with operating expenses. The cost of additions and betterments is not, and cannot be deducted. Yet, when the corporation does not discriminate between the two sets of disbursements, and offers no proof of the cost of repairs, the tax officers are warranted in considering the outlay therefor as not sufficient to reduce below 6 per cent the net income on the cost of the works; hence, the exaction of the tax does not impair the obligation of the contract of exemption. Com. v. Minersville Water Co. 13 Pa. Co. Ct. 17.

IX. Transfers and survivals.

a. In general.

A general rule, deducible from all the authorities, is that an exemption from, or a right to, a limited taxation belonging to a corporation is a privilege altogether personal to the grantee, incapable of transference to another save by a specific enabling law couched in ex-60 L. R. A.

b. Grants to one corporation of the rights, privileges, etc., of another.

As to what language used in a corporate charter granting the rights and privileges of an existent corporation invests the new company with the same right to, or exemption upon the property of corporations for pecuniary profit, the same as, or equally with, that of individuals; . . . that each shall be taxed for the same objects, and in the same degree, so that individuals shall not be required to pay any taxes on their property which are not also assessed and laid upon the property of corporations of the class named, nor in any greater proportion. When the legislature provides for taxing the property of individuals, this clause of the Constitution requires it to tax the property of corporations for pecuniary profit to the same extent and for the same purposes. If the property of individuals be taxed for state, county, school, and municipal purposes, the property of this class of corporations must be subjected to the same taxes, and at the same rates. The one cannot be exempt, and the other liable."

from, taxation possessed by the old one, the courts are not agreed. In some jurisdictions, and under some circumstances, certain words and phrases are deemed sufficient to clothe the grantee with the same immunity that the older corporation enjoys, while in other jurisdictions under circumstances varying only slightly, if at all, equivalent, not to say identical, language is held to work no such result.

A grant of "all the rights, powers, and privileges" of the old corporation carries its exemption over to the new one. Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 244, 21 L. ed. 326.

A clause in a railroad charter investing the company thereby incorporated "for the purpose of making and using its road" with all the "powers, rights, and privileges" of another railroad, grants only such powers, rights, and privileges as are necessary for the stated purpose; and, as immunity from taxation is not one of these, it is not conferred. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 97 U. S. 697, 24 L. ed. 1091.

An act of incorporation, investing a railroad company with all the rights and powers necessary to construct and maintain its road, and declaring that for such purpose it may have and use all the powers and privileges of, and be subject to the same obligations imposed upon, another railroad in its charter, confers no immunity from taxation such as the other road had. Annapolis & E. R. R. Co. v. Anne Arundel County, 103 U. S. 1, 26 L. ed. 359.

A grant to branch roads of a railroad corporation of all the powers, rights, and privileges the company enjoy with respect of its main line in the construction, use, and preservation of the branches, does not include the tax exemption of the main road. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 146 U. S. 279, 36 L. ed. 972, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72.

A statute subrogating a new railroad corporation to all the rights and privileges of an old one does not carry over an immunity from taxation. But this result is more certainly due to the Constitution having taken away the legislative power to confer exemption prior to the passage of the law. Gulf & S. I. R. Co. v. Hewes, 183 U. S. 66, 46 L. ed. 86, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

Although a corporation granted "all the rights, privileges, and immunities" of a pre-existing corporation may be invested thereby with an immunity from taxation given to the first company in its charter, such immunity does not pass over to a third corporation granted no more than the "rights and privileges" of the second one. Memphis v. Phoenix F. & M. Ins. Co. 91 Tenn. 566, 19 S. W. 1044. Affirmed in 161 U. S. 174, 40 L. ed. 660, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471.

It will thus be seen that on the particular holding of Mississippi Mills v. Cook, which we now overrule, this court stood absolutely alone, its decision in direct conflict with all the decisions we have just above cited. So much for the mere inaccuracy of that holding.

We turn now to the proposition that the overruling of Mississippi Mills v. Cook, as to the holding which we have particularized, overturns a rule of property and destroys a vested right on which the railroad company has a right to rely. The alleged vested right is this: That the 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern charter containing this alleged exemption has been declared repeatedly in this state by Mississippi Mills v. Cook and other cases, down to and including the Lambert Case, not to have been violative of the Constitution of 1869. This

Nor does an act investing a corporation with all the "powers, rights, reservations, restrictions, and liabilities" of another corporation confer the latter's tax immunity. Home Ins. & T. Co. v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 161 U. S. 198, 200, 40 L. ed. 669, 670, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 476.

Some of the Tennessee bank cases (vide VIII. a, 2, supra) are pertinent upon this topic.

A provision in a corporate charter that the company chartered shall have all the powers allowed, perform all the duties required, and have and enjoy, subject to the same conditions, limitations, and restrictions, all the rights, powers, and privileges of another corporation therein named does not carry over to the new company an exemption from taxation belonging to the old one, so as to exonerate it from a privilege tax. Wallace v. Cornersville & L. Turnp. Co. 92 Tenn. 369, 22 S. W. 75.

The recital, in an act incorporating a railroad company, of a charter granted it by another state into which its line was projected, followed by enactment sections providing that such railroad shall be a domestic body corporate with all the powers and privileges given by its foreign charter, invests the company thus created with the same exemption from taxation that the other state gave it. Atlantic, T. & O. R. Co. v. Mecklenberg County, 87 N. C. 129.

A foreign corporation purchasing a domestic railroad, and afterwards incorporated in the same state with "all the rights, privileges, and powers" of its vendor, is not thereby invested with the tax immunity of the original company. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Com. 97 Ky. 162, 30 S. W. 200.

When the charter of a railroad corporation gives it immunity, to a certain extent and under certain circumstances, from taxation, and also extends to it, "as fully as if the same had been inserted" therein, "all the rights, privileges, immunities, and franchises" of another railroad not inconsistent with its own charter, its immunity from taxation is not enlarged by reference to the other charter, which gives the other company a right to commute and be exempt from taxes by provisions fundamentally different from those upon the same subject in the last charter. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 509, Affirmed in 113 U. S. 465, 28 L. ed. 1055, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529.

statement is wholly inaccurate, and is the result alone of a careless study of the decisions of this court. There are some primary rules on the subject of stare decisis to which we shall first call attention. They are formulated by the Supreme Court of the United States as follows: (1) The court is not bound by expressions in former decisions on points which were not contested. Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 86, 36 L. ed. 898, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22. (2) The doctrine of stare decisis cannot be invoked in favor of decisions on former statutes which were more similar to, but not identical with, the one under review. Wood v. Brady, 150 U. S. 20, 37 L. ed. 982, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6. This rule was relied upon by the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated Income-Tax Case (Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 574, 39

L. ed. 816, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673); the court pointing out that, while the language of former decisions was sometimes very broad, yet the exact points involved in all former decisions were different. (3) It is expressly held that a decision that a statute constitutes a contract, and that an act repealing it is void, is not an estoppel to a subsequent decision holding that the former statute itself is unconstitutional, and this is the exact case now before us. Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302.

Keeping these principles steadily in mind, a review of the decisions of this court will show that no charter identical with that of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad was ever passed on in this state until January, 1891, a period subsequent to the purchase of that road by the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company; from

When the state makes an agreement with parties for the leasing of a state railroad, and confers on such road in such agreement the same "exemptions, privileges, immunities, rights, and guaranties," and imposes the same "liabilities, disabilities, and public burdens, and no more," as are possessed by and rest upon certain named and previously chartered railroads which are severally exempt from taxation beyond a stated percentage of their net incomes, and requires the lessees to incorporate, the new corporation and leased road cannot be subjected to a higher rate of taxation, or a different tax, notwithstanding an antecedent outstanding general statute enacting that every private charter thereafter granted shall be subject to the right of the state to withdraw the franchise, unless such right is expressly surrendered in such charter. Western & A. R. Co. v. State, 54 Ga. 428.

c. Consolidations.

An exemption from, or right to, a limited taxation, given to a corporation, does not survive a consolidation with another corporation in the absence of words in the corporate charter expressly authorizing its transfer, or of a new grant in the consolidating law. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 509, Affirmed in 113 U. S. 465, 28 L. ed. 1055, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529.

In the numerous cases which have arisen in this court, says Mr. Justice Brown, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, not long since, as to the effect of a consolidation upon the existence and status of constituent corporations, it has been held that the question of the dissolution of such corporations depended upon the language of the statute under which the consolidation took place,—the presumption in each case being that each of the two lines of road will be held respectively to the privileges and burdens originally attaching thereto. If, upon the one hand, the identity of the prior corporations is preserved, an exemption from taxation which one of them possessed falls to that portion of the new corporation to which, under its former name, it had been attached. If, on the other hand, the consolidation worked a dissolution of the prior corporations, their former privileges and franchises also ceased to exist. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. (That case was in the latter category.)

the consolidation of the Baltimore & Port Deposit road with the Delaware & Maryland—the consolidated corporation was deemed rather a merger of the constituents than a new body, and retained the immunity which one constituent had before the union upon the same part of the line, neither losing that, nor gaining aught beyond. Philadelphia & W. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. 376, 13 L. ed. 461.

In the next case, an exemption of one constituent in a consolidated railroad was held to have survived the consolidation to the extent of contribution to the common property and effects, where the law authorizing the union did not make taxation a condition thereof, and did provide that the consolidated company should have all the rights and privileges of its constituents, although an exemption which the other road in the combination at one time had, had ceased to exist. Tomlinson v. Branch, 15 Wall. 460, 21 L. ed. 189.

The Delaware Railroad Tax Case decided that a provision in a state statute authorizing a consolidation of domestic and foreign railroads,—the corporation to be formed pursuant thereto to constitute one company and be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities which each and all of the constituents possessed, had, and enjoyed in virtue of their respective charters; together with a provision in a previous statute under which one of such constituents had been formed by the consolidation of a domestic railroad with another road in an adjoining state, that the two companies should, when united, hold and possess all the property rights and privileges which either or both had by the laws of either state,—did not entitle the domestic company entering into such successive consolidations, nor the successive consolidated companies in the same state, to an exemption from taxation therein upon the property, effects, or other attributes brought to the consolidated company by such domestic corporation, although the foreign railroads, or one of them, in the combination enjoyed such an exemption at home. 18 Wall. 206, 21 L. ed. 888.

When the state does not reserve a right to tax differently in a statute authorizing the consolidation of a road enjoying by contract a limited taxation with another without any immunity, as a condition of their union, she may not afterwards tax at a higher rate the road built under the charter of the commuting constituent. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Georgia, 92 U. S. 665, 23 L. ed. 757.

An act whereby any domestic railroad com-which it necessarily follows that that purchase could not have been made on the faith of that decision rendered in 1891. It will further be seen that the question whether the 21st section of the charter of the Mobile & Northwestern Railroad Company violated the Constitution of 1869, as we hold it did, has never been passed on in this state up to this time. The cases in this state relied on to show the opposite of these facts are as follows: Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40, decided at the April term, 1878, where the sole question was, according to the opinion, whether exemption under general law was repealable or irrepealable; the constitutionality of the exemption was not argued or decided. But much more than this is to be said about Mississippi Mills v. Cook. An examination of the original record in Mississippi Mills v. Cook shows that it was a bill for injunction by the Mississippi Mills against Cook, tax collector, averring the establishment of its factory after and on the faith of the acts of 1872 and 1873 granting an exemption in consideration of the construction of factories, etc., and that Cook was willing to accept the affidavit for the taxes of the mill proper, but refused to accept the affidavit for taxes on outlying land; and the bill prayed an injunction against Cook prohibiting the sale of its property for these taxes assessed on outlying lands, on the ground that they were essentially part of the mill property, for wood, etc. The bill averred that under the act of 1877 Cook himself insisted on collecting these taxes on these lands. There was a general demurrer to the bill, sustained by the court below, and the bill was dismissed, and an appeal taken to the supreme court.

pany whose track connects with the road of an adjoining state is authorized to agree with such connecting road for the consolidation of the stock of both, making one company of the two, upon approval of a majority of the stockholders of each, with provisions for calling in the old stock and issuing in the place of it stock in the new company, and for filing the consolidation agreement and the name adopted for the new company with the secretary of state to be conclusive evidence of the consolidation and new corporate name,—works, when complied with, a dissolution of the domestic constituent company and the extinguishment of an exemption from taxation granted to it, and creates a new corporation without such immunity. Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

A consolidated railroad corporation formed of separate railroads, each of them, by its charter, subject to special and limited taxation and immune from all other taxes, is not entitled to the commutations or exemptions of its constituents when the consolidating statute merely gave it in general terms their rights, franchises, and interest, their property powers, privileges, and immunities, and made it subject to all their legal obligations. State v. Maine C. R. Co. 66 Me. 488.

The New Jersey court of errors and appeals, according to Depue, J., in State Board v. Morris & E. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 193, 7 Atl. 826 (and the case he cites fully sustains him), "has also held that the words 'franchises, privileges, and immunities,' in a statute creating a corporation by the consolidation of two existing corporations, were sufficient to grant to the new corporation an exemption from taxation contained in the charters of the other companies."

The authority for this proposition is the case of Cook v. State, Camden & B. C. R. Co., Prosecutors, 33 N. J. L. 474.

An exemption was held, in Maryland, not to have survived a consolidation, because the consolidating statute was to be regarded as a new charter to a new corporation, and an intermediate change in the state Constitution had shorn the legislature of power to perpetuate such an exemption. Alvey, J., dissented upon the ground that the consolidating act was a mere merger leaving the companies with unimpaired exemptions. State v. Northern C. R. Co. 44 Md. 131.

The views of the majority, however, have prevailed. Northern C. R. Co. v. Maryland, 187 U. S. 238, 47 L. ed. —, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 62, affirming 90 Md. 449, 45 Atl. 465 60 L. R. A.

The Maryland court of appeals decided that the successive consolidations which finally evolved the Philadelphia, Wilmington, & Baltimore Railroad Company had not in that state extinguished the exemption originally given to the Maryland constituent, although the statutes of consolidation were not broader in terms and scope than many held elsewhere to have had the opposite effect. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Bayless, 2 Gill, 355; State v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 45 Md. 361, 24 Am. Rep. 511.

A railroad charter containing an exemption from any tax whatever, but expressly subject to alteration, modification, or amendment by any future legislature, except in respect of rates of transportation, and if property rights are not taken away or impaired, is in effect repealed, and the exemption conferred terminated, by a consolidation under a statute declaring that in no event shall the property within the state, of either of the united companies, be exempt from taxation. Petersburg v. Petersburg R. Co. 29 Gratt. 773.

D. Mortgage foreclosures.

Nor can a right to commuted taxation, or to an exemption from taxation, be acquired through a mortgage foreclosure of the franchises, property, rights, and privileges of a corporation, unless the statute in point in clear language distinctly authorizes the immunity to continue, and the decrees follow the statute. Arkansas Midland R. Co. v. Berry, 44 Ark. 17.

A grant by the state to a railroad corporation of all the rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities which were enjoyed under its charter and the laws amendatory thereof by an older railroad company acquired by the state upon mortgage foreclosure, when the old company had an exemption from taxation resting in an irrepealable contract, does not carry over to the grantee such exemption, especially after a new Constitution prohibiting all exemptions has in the meantime come into operation. Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 391, 21 L. ed. 938.

The franchises of a railroad do not include all its rights, privileges, and immunities, but such only as are essential to the operation of the road and without which it would be of little value, such as the right to run cars, take tolls, appropriate earth and gravel for roadbed, take water for engines, etc., etc.; hence the sale of the road, its property and franchises, upon mortgage foreclosure does not convey to the purchaser the exemption from taxation given by the charter of the company. Such an ex-

The sole question involved, therefore, as thus clearly shown by the record itself, arose under the general exemption law applicable to all the factories of the class described, and not to a special grant of a special exemption to a particular corporation. All, therefore, that appears in the opinion, beyond what would relate to the right to collect these taxes on outlying land, is mere dictum; for, in determining what has been adjudged, courts look to the decree and the record, and are not controlled by the mere opinion. Herman, Estoppel, & Res Adjudicata, p. 470. Another striking difference between the exemption claimed in that case and in this is that the act of 1872, under which that exemption was asserted, did not attempt to preserve exemptions granted to corporations or individuals establishing factories under its provision from legislative repeal; whereas, in the act of 1870, this 21st section is declared in the Lambert Case a miserable attempt to evade the Constitution of 1869, and secure an irrevocable grant of exemption, and that, too, to a particular corporation. The next case is McCulloch v. Stone (1886) 64 Miss. 378, 8 So. 236, in which the only question involved was whether outlying lands of a railroad company were embraced in an exemption contained in that charter, the court holding that they were not. The next case is Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Thomas (1888) 65 Miss. 553, 5 So. 108, in which the only question involved was whether the property was exempt before completion of the railroad to the Mississippi river. The charter provided for a twenty-years exemption after such completion, the court holding that it was not exempt. The next case is Vicksburg emption, if not a mere personal privilege not transferable to a third party, can in any event only pass by express and definite terms of conveyance. Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 23 L. ed. 860.

Immunity from taxation does not pass to the purchaser of a railroad upon the sale thereof under a decree foreclosing the lien of the state reserved to secure its bonds, even where the purchaser stipulates for a full and perfect title to the road with its franchises and privileges. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hamblen County, 102 U. S. 273, 26 L. ed. 152; Pickard v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 130 U. S. 637, 32 L. ed. 1051, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 640.

To the same effect is Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Miller, 114 U. S. 176, 29 L. ed. 121, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813.

In Tennessee, however, it was held that the sale of a railroad upon foreclosure of the lien of the state thereon by a decree in chancery adjudging by the direct authority of an enabling statute that not only the property, but all the rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities, pass to the purchaser, carried over to a new railroad corporation which purchased the line at the judicial sale the right of tax exemption enjoyed and belonging to the delinquent company, although by an intervening amendment of the state Constitution the legislature might not have power to grant de novo a like exemption to a new corporation. Knoxville & O. R. Co. v. Hicks, 9 Baxt. 442.

The court distinguished the cases of Trask v. Maguire, 18 Wall. 301, 21 L. ed. 938, and Morgan v. Louisiana, 93 U. S. 217, 23 L. ed. 860, by saying that the exemptions involved in those cases were less broad than that in the case at bar, where the road as a whole, with all its appurtenances and franchises as an entirety, was exempt. It thought such an exemption more than a mere personal privilege; that it was an integral part of the franchises.

Of that decision, Waite, Ch. J., afterwards said that it "distinctly adjudged that not only the property of the old company, but all its rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities, as defined by the charter and laws and the decree in the cause, passed to and vested in the new company;" whence, it followed that the tax immunity was included and also passed. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hamblen County, 102 U. S. 273, 26 L. ed. 152.

And in Texas it was also said that, while it was true, as a general proposition, that an exemption from taxation held by a railroad corporation in virtue of its charter or other contract law would not pass to a purchaser upon foreclosure of its property and franchises by mere force of the decree of sale, but was extinguished, yet, when such an exemption arose under a statute declaring in express terms that the said railroad company and its successors and their capital stock, rights, franchises, railroads constructed and to be constructed, rolling stock, and all other property then or thereafter owned or possessed by said company or its successors were exempted and released from all state, county, town, city, municipal, and other taxes; closing with a further declaration that such statute shall be held to constitute an irrevocable contract between the state and the said company, its successors and assigns,—the case is taken out of the general rule. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith County, 65 Tex. 21; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Anderson County, 59 Tex. 654.

While, perhaps, in general, a total or partial exemption from taxation of a railroad corporation is a personal privilege which ordinarily does not pass upon a mortgage foreclosure sale of its rights, privileges, franchises, and immunities, yet, when such privilege has been expressly permitted by constitutional amendment to be made the subject of a mortgage, and the state acquires and conveys it after foreclosure to another company, it must be held to have inured to the new corporation. First Div. of St. Paul & P. R. Co. v. Parcher, 14 Minn. 297, Gil. 224.

e. Other successions.

It does not greatly matter what form the succession of one corporation to the property, privileges, rights, and franchises takes; the same general principles noted ubi supra apply. An assignee of railroad property exempt from taxation in the hands of the assignor gets it without the immunity, unless some statute expressly preserves it, and the Constitution does not prevent its continuance.

When a railroad corporation acquires by purchase pursuant to an enabling statute the right to hold, use, enjoy, and employ an earlier railroad, and all the property and effects of every nature and kind thereof, with all the rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities granted to and conferred upon it by the states in which it operated, "in as ample a manner as the legislature of this state can confer them, subject Bank v. Worrell (1889) 67 Miss. 47, 7 So. 219, where the legislature had provided for what the court calls a privilege tax on all banks in the state, and the question was whether this violated article 12, § 20, of the Constitution of 1869, providing that taxation shall be equal and uniform and in proportion to value, and the court held that it did not. The next case is Attala County v. Kelly (1890) 68 Miss. 44, 8 So. 376, a case in which the bank had paid in advance a commutation tax of $1,000, called by the court a "privilege tax," and the legislature in the same year repealed that law, and provided for an ad valorem tax. The court held it was liable to the ad valorem tax notwithstanding it had paid the commutation tax, and that was the only point involved. The next case is Louisville, N. O. & T. R. Co. v. Taylor (decided at October term, 1890) 68 Miss. 361, 8 So. 675, not actually decided, however, till January 26, 1891, as the records of this court show. No question was raised in that case, by counsel or the court, as to the constitutionality of the exemption contained in such § 21 of the Mobile & Northwestern charter. The sole question involved was the right to exemption of a gravel pit claimed by the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company under the charter of the Vicksburg, Pensacola, & Ship Island Railroad Company,—afterwards the Mississippi & Ship Island Railroad Company,—which never was a part of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, and the court decided that the exemption should be allowed under that charter. This was a most extraordinary mistake, for it is now conceded by counsel for the railroad and everybody else that the

in all respects . . . to all the duties, regulations, and penalties required, prescribed, and enjoined by any law or laws now in force" respecting such company,—it steps into the shoes of the company, acquired according to its status at the time of the purchase, and does not thereby acquire an immunity from taxation granted in the original charter thereof when subsequent legislation accepted by it has taken away such immunity, and made such charter subject to alteration, modification, and repeal, and such company liable to taxation like other railroads of the state. Seaboard & R. R. Co. v. Norfolk County, 83 Va. 195, 2 S. E. 278.

The exemption of a main line of a railroad corporation does not attach to an extension of such main line made by acquiring the road of another company. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 146 U. S. 279, 36 L. ed. 972, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 72.

A railroad corporation required by its own charter to pay such taxes to the state upon its road, stock, and other property as other railroads pay, does not acquire an exemption from taxation which belonged to a former company by its charter, by a purchase of the latter's rights and franchises, and a statute declaring that the rights and franchises so purchased are thereby granted to such purchaser, when there are no provisions in the statute either conferring an exemption in express terms, or altering the purchaser's own charter in respect of taxation. Evansville, H. & N. R. Co. v. Com. 9 Bush, 438.

A railroad acquiring the powers, privileges, rights, and franchises of another road entitled to a limited taxation by an amendment to its charter does not acquire the right to commute taxes when, prior to the change of ownership, the general revenue law of the state has superseded the special taxation law. Kentucky C. R. Co. v. Com. 87 Ky. 661, 10 S. W. 269.

A corporation empowered by the law of its organization to take from a pre-existing corporation which has become insolvent a conveyance of all its franchises, rights, powers, privileges, and immunities, and to hold and enjoy the same in as full and ample a manner to all intents and purposes as they had been held and enjoyed by the earlier corporation; and, with its stockholders, further endowed with all the immunities as these had been held and enjoyed by the old company and its stockholders,—thereby succeeds to all the benefits of a statute which provided that the stock and income of the old company should be forever exempt from 60 L. R. A.

taxation. Nichols v. New Haven & N. Co. 42 Conn. 103.

A lease for the whole period of its chartered existence of all its property and franchises by one railroad corporation to another, and a ratifying act of the legislature "to have, hold, use, enjoy, possess, and exercise . . . the property, things, franchises, immunities, rights, powers, and privileges" by such lease and contract granted, leased, or demised, although neither indenture nor validating statute mentions taxation, carry over to and vest in the lessee company all the rights, privileges, and immunities belonging to the lessor company to commute taxes and be exempt otherwise from taxation enjoyed by it in virtue of an irrevocable contract with the state found in its charter and the supplements to such charter. State Board v. Morris & E. R. Co. 49 N. J. L. 193, 7 Atl. 826.

An act incorporating a railroad company chartered by another state, reciting the foreign charter and providing that the holder of it shall be a domestic corporation with all the powers and privileges given it by such foreign charter, not only grants the domestic company thus created the same exemption from taxation that the foreign charter gave it, but such immunity continues to its successor by a new title formed under an amendatory statute, which, though effecting fundamental changes, does not abrogate the former act or substitute a new company. Atlantic, T. & O. R. Co. v. Mecklenburg County, 87 N. C. 129.

When a statute explicitly declares that a railroad company is authorized and empowered to acquire by purchase and assignment all the property, rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities of another railroad; and, upon completion of such purchase and assignment, the former company shall be deemed in law and in equity invested with and entitled to all the said property, rights, franchises, privileges, and immunities as though the same were originally granted to it,—the language is broad enough to transfer an immunity from taxation. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 244, 27 L. ed. 922, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193.

When a general statute authorizes street railway companies to purchase and thereafter use and enjoy other railways and their rights, privileges, and franchises, just as the grantee might have done, a city contract for the payment of a percentage of gross earnings as a commutation for municipal taxes and the immunity from other taxation given thereby, possessed by a street railway corporation, will pass charter of the Vicksburg, Pensacola, & Ship Island Railroad Company, afterwards the Mississippi & Ship Island Railroad Company, had nothing on earth to do with the charters of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, nor was that railroad any constituent of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company. It appears that the court was led into this mistake by an assumption of counsel to that effect in the case. Certain it is that it was a tremendous mistake of fact, and one against the sovereign right of taxation. It is perfectly obvious that this case is wholly fictitious, and is of no authority for any purpose. It is further to be observed, however, that inasmuch as the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company purchased the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company in March, 1890, and the decision in the Taylor Case was not rendered until January 26, 1891, the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company could not possibly have made said purchase on the faith of the Taylor Case, nor on the faith of § 181 of the Constitution of 1890, because that was not adopted until November 1, 1890, and then continued only legal exemptions to corporations retaining the precise identity they had before the Constitution was adopted. The next case is State v. Simmons (1890) 70 Miss. 485, 12 So. 477, which involved the mere question as to whether the capital stock was exempt under the charter, and the court held that it was not. The next case, and the last, is Natchez, J. & C. R. Co. v. Lambert (1893) 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33, and the question contested in that case was whether the exemption of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Com-and inure to the benefit of its transferees. Detroit Citizens' Street R. Co. v. Detroit, 125 Mich. 673, 85 N. W. 96, 86 N. W. 809.

When a state, in chartering a corporation to build a line of railroad, enacts that such corporation shall be forever exempt from taxation in consideration of the yearly payment, beginning after the lapse of a definite period following the completion of a stated mileage and increasing as the years go on; and thereafter, upon the failure of such corporation to construct the line, enacts a statute forfeiting its franchises to the state without extinction or merger; and by it provides that any other railroad corporation organized or to be organized with authority from the state to build, maintain, and operate a road within it, may, on compliance with certain stated conditions, succeed to and become invested with all and singular the rights, privileges, immunities, franchises, lands, and properties thus resumed and appertaining to the part of the road it shall take and complete,—a new corporation availing itself of, and meeting the conditions in, such statute, takes the tax exemption privileges, and assumes the reciprocal obligation of payment on account of its gross earnings; and such payment begins when the requisite time has elapsed after the stipulated mileage has been constructed upon any part of the original line, regardless of the state of the portion taken up anew. State v. Northern P. R. Co. 36 Minn. 207, 30 N. W. 663.

About the same time, in Stevens County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 36 Minn. 467, 31 N. W. 942, the same state court declared, with emphasis: "That the exemption from ordinary taxation, created in 1857 in favor of the Minnesota & Pacific Railroad Company, subsequently passed with the lands and as a right appendant thereto to the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company, and to the First Division of the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad Company, may be now accepted without question. It was so decided eighteen years ago in the case of the last-named Company v. Parcher, 14 Minn. 297, Gil. 224, which decision has been ever since followed. . . . We are not disposed to reconsider a question so long settled and so often recognized as settled in this court, and will only add that we do not think the decision . . . has been disturbed by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States."

Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Deuel County, 3 Dak. 1, 12 N. E. 561.

The same subject was taken up again more recently still by the supreme court of Minnesota in the case of Traverse County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 73 Minn. 417, 76 N. W. 217, and, in speaking of the statutes of the state in respect of the gross earnings taxes to be paid by the land grant roads in lieu of all other taxes, that court said: The decisions of this court from the Parcher Case down have all been to the effect that this exemption from ordinary taxation was not simply a personal privilege conferred upon the original company, but was appurtenant to the line of the road, and existed in favor of any company which, in consideration of the land grant, should assume the construction and maintenance of the line by which it was applicable; that the immunity, as well as the burden, passed to any company which acquired the road and assumed its operation and the performance of all the other duties which the original company owed to the public; that the transfer of the road and land grant to such a company did not constitute a sale of the lands within the meaning of either the act of 1857 or of acts similar to those of 1865. And, as support for this statement, there is cited the following line of cases: State v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 315; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Pfender, 23 Minn. 217; St. Paul v. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. 23 Minn. 469; Nobles County v. Sioux City & St. P. R. Co. 26 Minn. 294, 3 N. W. 701; State v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 30 Minn. 311, 15 N. W. 307; State v. Northern P. R. Co. 32 Minn. 294, 20 N. W. 234; Hennepin County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 33 Minn. 534, 24 N. W. 196; Ramsey County v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 33 Minn. 537, 24 N. W. 313; Stevens County v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 36 Minn. 467, 31 N. W. 942.

From the decision, however, one member of the court dissented. Canty, J., who thus disagreed, said: But, out of respect to the Parcher Case and the other cases explaining it and the rule of property resulting therefrom, I do not stand on the doctrine that such an immunity from taxation is a personal privilege, strong as that doctrine is. I stand on a still stronger doctrine, which is that the condition on which this immunity from taxation was granted, has happened, and the immunity has expired.

f. Loss of exemption.

Apart from the cases already noticed, there pany, which had been purchased by the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, passed to the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, the court deciding that it did. The question whether that exemption violated the Constitution of 1869 was not argued by counsel or considered or decided by the court.

These are the cases on which so much reliance has been placed to show a vested right,—a rule of property,—and it is perfectly manifest that in none of them was it proper to have decided upon the constitutionality of this § 21, unless in the Taylor Case and the Lambert Case, because in none of the other cases was that question involved, and they could all have been decided without reference to that question; and consequently, under the authority of Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 429, 39 L. ed. 759, have been a few in which it was contended that, under the special circumstances disclosed, the exemption privileges theretofore enjoyed by the corporation had been extinguished.

In two of the Minnesota land grant cases, where the exemption of the lands granted was to terminate when they were sold by the grantees, it was decided that a transfer of such lands to stockholders of the railroads merely as security for debts did not constitute a sale so as to subject them to taxation; but it was otherwise if the whole beneficial interest in such lands was conveyed to the stockholders, and the company retained only a naked legal title. St. Paul & S. C. R. Co. v. McDonald, 34 Minn. 182, 25 N. W. 57; St. Paul & C. R. Co. v. McDonald, 34 Minn. 195, 25 N. W. 453.

The division of the territory of Minnesota after such railroad lands were granted and the exemption thereof conferred upon the roads, and the organization of Dakota territory, did not affect the continued exemption of such lands as became a part of the new territory. Winona & St. P. R. Co. v. Deuel County, 3 Dak. 1, 12 N. W. 561.

The exemption of a railroad from county taxation to pay county subscriptions in aid of its construction is not wholly lost to the purchaser of such railroad, but the purchaser becomes taxable for subsequent additions or betterments. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins County, 87 Ky. 605, 9 S. W. 497.

Such an exemption is not lost by a mere division of the railroad entitled to it into two separate companies. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Com. 89 Ky. 531, 12 S. W. 1064.

A statute relating to quo warranto actions, providing that in case, inter alia, "any corporation does or omits any act which amounts to a surrender or a forfeiture of its rights and privileges as a corporation" the attorney general may take proceedings, contemplates the forfeiture of the right and privilege to be a corporation or to exercise the powers and enjoy the franchise necessary to the purposes of its creation. It has no application to the rights and privileges the corporation may have in its property; hence, it affords no authority to vacate a grant exempting the corporate property from taxation, while leaving the charter and the corporate existence otherwise intact. International & G. N. R. Co. v. State, 75 Tex. 357, 12 S. W. 685.

A banking corporation having by its charter and subsequent statutes a right to a limited taxation in lieu of all other taxes is not, after the term of its existence would have expired, 60 L. R. A.

15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673, and Boyd v. Alabama, 94 U. S. 645, 24 L. ed. 302, they are not binding, under the doctrine of stare decisis even, on this court in this case. And, while the question of the constitutionality of said § 21 was involved in the Taylor Case and the Lambert Case, the constitutionality of the exemption was conceded on all hands, and not contested, and, not having been contested, these cases, as held in Cross v. Burke, 146 U. S. 82, 36 L. ed. 896, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 22, are of no force on us in this case, under the doctrine of stare decisis. It will thus be clearly seen: (1) That the exemption claimed in Mississippi Mills v. Cook was one claimed under a general law applicable to all the factories in the state of the same class: whereas, the exemption claimed here, to wit, the 21st section of the charter of the Mobile & Northwestern Railroad Company, had it not been extended by a later law, entitled to a continuance of such limited tax and exemption from further taxation, with no further grant in the statute extending its corporate life than one of its "powers, privileges, and franchises." State v. Bank of Smyrna, 2 Houst. (Del.) 99, 73 Am. Dec. 609.

An exemption from taxation granted in the charter of a corporation for establishing useful manufactures, whose powers include the acquisition of lands and water rights, the building of dams, canals, and flumes, and the furnishing of water power, is not lost in consequence of a later act of the legislature giving such corporation the right and power to extend its operations by condemning other lands and raising its dams. Such an act works no change in the character and attributes of the corporation, whose purposes are the same as before. It is like authority to a railroad to lengthen its line. It is not a new franchise. State v. Society for Establishing Useful Manufactures (N. J.) 6 Cent. Rep. 139.

If the consideration of an exemption grant is the building, equipping, and operating of the corporate works for public convenience, the exemption is lost by failure to complete and operate them. Ford v. Delta & P. Land Co. 43 Fed. 181.

A fortiori is such an exemption lost when the charter that confers it provides that if the corporation shall not have completed its main line within a stated time it shall forfeit so much of the granted rights and privileges as apply to the uncompleted part. Wilmington & W. R. Co. v. Alsbrook, 110 N. C. 137, 14 S. E. 652.

A lease for a thousand years of all its property by one railroad to another without reversion, upon consideration of completing the road in a definite time, extinguishes an exemption from taxation. Com. v. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. 93 Ky. 430, 20 S. W. 383.

If a corporation falls for many years to accept and organize under its charter, and in the interval the state Constitution changes so as to command that all property be taxed and to prohibit tax exemptions, the grant in such charter of a tax exemption lawful when made is withdrawn, and the immunity is lost. State v. Planters' F. & M. Ins. Co. 95 Tenn. 203, 31 S. W. 992; Planters' F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee use of Memphis, 161 U. S. 193, 40 L. ed. 667, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 466; State v. Mercantile Bank, 95 Tenn. 212, 31 S. W. 989.

When a section in a general law for the taxation of railroads, providing that every comis an exemption attempted to be granted to this special corporation, and not to all the other railroads in the state,—a special privilege under a special charter to a special corporation. (2) That the Mississippi Mills had established their factory, after the passage of the acts of 1872 and 1873, on the faith of those acts as a rule of property; whereas, the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company never came into existence, as admitted by counsel for the railroad, until the 12th day of August, 1884, by the consolidation of the Baton Rouge Railroad and the Vicksburg & Memphis Railroad, after the construction of the road had been practically finished in July, 1884. (3) That the exemption claimed in Mississippi Mills v. Cook had no irrepealable feature; whereas, the exemption set up under the said 21st section is on its face irrepeal-able, and was so judicially declared to be, in the Lambert Case itself. (4) That the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company claims under charters granted in 1882 and 1884, asserting as its exemption this 21st section, the unconstitutionality of which, as violative of § 13 of article 12 of the Constitution of 1869, was not only not considered, argued, or decided in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, but which, by virtue of its irrepealable feature and its special grant of an exclusive privilege to a special corporation, would have been condemned by the reasoning of that very case. (5) And not only it is true that the particular exemption claimed here, under this 21st section, was not argued or decided in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, but no other decision was ever rendered in this state in which the constitutionality of this 21st section was even in-pany accepting the terms thereof and conformably therewith paying for a stated term annually a percentage of its gross receipts shall be exempt for that period from taxation. Is a nullity on account of conflicting with a constitutional provision requiring all property to be assessed and taxed equally and uniformly ad valorem,—a railroad that accepts such unconstitutional section, and pays the percentage tax fixed thereby, and surrenders the immunities it held under a perfectly valid charter exemption antedating such constitutional provision, as a consideration for the benefits offered by the void statute, does not thereby make a new contract with the state (although such would be the result if the statute was valid), since the legislature is powerless to make such a contract; but the acceptance and attempted change are void with the act they rest upon, and the charter contract remains unimpaired. Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Gaines, 3 Tenn. Ch. 604.

X. Conclusion.

The principal case and its congeners are in line with the current of authority. Grants of exemption are ever limited to their lowest terms. Every doubt in them is resolved against the grantee. The state is always considered not to have surrendered the power of taxation; deemed ever entitled to resume it if, perchance, it has parted with it. The immunity, presumptively, is a personal grant, and not transferable. Its continued enjoyment is contingent upon a rigidly exact observance of all the conditions upon which it was granted and a rigid maintenance of the status of the recipient.

There is a remarkable contrast between the attitude of the Maryland court of appeals toward the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad exemption and that of the Mississippi supreme court with respect of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad exemption. It is, says the former, a matter of notoriety and of history, that in chartering the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, the legislature and the people of Maryland regarded the completion of the work as a great state object, tending, eminently, to promote the future wealth and prosperity of Maryland, and particularly of the city of Baltimore, and to contribute to the permanence of the union of the United States. They also were duly sensible that this gigantic and patriotic undertaking could not be accomplished but at great expense and hazard of pecuniary loss to its undertakers. As an encouragement to the enterprise, they were willing to confer on it every immunity, privilege, and exemption which could reasonably be required and tend to its completion. In expounding, therefore, those provisions of the charter of the company by which its express privileges and exemptions are imparted, liberal rules of interpretation for its benefit ought to be adopted to effectuate the benevolent designs of the legislature, and not such rules of restriction as should be applied to the charters of companies incorporated for the peculiar benefit of their stockholders. Baltimore v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 6 Gill, 288, 48 Am. Dec. 531.

But although this was written in 1848, long before it became popular to hold the opposite opinion, the court as late as 1877 had not changed its views, even while admitting that it was a sound rule of construction that the power of taxation is never presumed to be relinquished unless the intent to relinquish it is clearly expressed. State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 48 Md. 49.

The net outcome of the Tennessee bank litigations, like those of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, has been, with less justification, to take away from the corporations practically all exemption whatever, and yet leave them bound to pay the commuted taxes. The contracts are left just as binding as ever upon the corporations; but judicial interpretation has emasculated them so far as the state of Tennessee is concerned. The doctrine that capital stock and share stock are two different subjects of taxation, and that the exemption or taxation of the one does not exempt the other, that has been so artistically and scientifically applied to extinguish entirely the corporate immunity, is a modern development. And, although such doctrine is now firmly established, it was, if in existence at all, quite embryonic in the middle of the nineteenth century, when these charters were granted. Knowing that the intention of the legislature is, when contracting upon the subject of taxation in a corporate charter, the dominant factor, one is moved to marvel if the Tennessee legislatures in the '50's intended to grant the corporations any real exemption or cheat them with a shadow.

In respect of the extent of an exemption from taxation granted to a corporation, the general rules that have found favor in the greater number of cases are: (1) That an exemption of the capital stock of a corporation does not necessarily exempt the property in which the capital stock has been invested. (2) That an exemption of corporate property is no barrier volved, until McCulloch v. Stone, decided in 1886, 64 Miss. 378, 8 So. 236, four years after the grant of the charter of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company. (6) From which it necessarily follows that that road was not built on the faith of any decision ever rendered in this state, up to the time of the grant of its charter, which even involved the constitutionality of said 21st section, and that the claim that it was organized or built on the faith of such decision, operating as a rule of property, is utterly unfounded and absurd. (7) That the Taylor Case was neither more nor less than a fictitious case, which misled the court by the misstatement of fact that the Vicksburg, Pensacola, & Ship Island Railroad, afterwards Gulf & Ship Island Railroad, was one of the constituent members of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad, and its charter was a constituent charter of that railroad, and that the Taylor Case is authority for nothing. (8) That the Lambert Case was decided at the March term, 1893, eleven years after, not before, the grant of the charter of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company. And it is hence utterly incomprehensible to the legal mind how anybody could invoke that case, under the doctrine of stare decisis, as affording a rule of property to a company constructed under a charter granted before it was rendered. Such claim becomes more incomprehensible still when the further fact is recalled that the consolidation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas and Yazoo & Mississippi Valley into the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company took place October 24, 1892, long before the decision in the Lambert Case.

Let us get out of the realm of idle and reckless assertion into the realm of fact, and inquire more particularly and accurately exactly what was decided, even in the opinion of the court, which went far beyond the record, in Mississippi Mills v. Cook. The to a franchise or privilege tax. (3) That an exemption of the shares does not exempt the corporation from property taxes, nor always from franchise taxes. (4) That an exemption of the corporation from both property and franchise taxation may yet leave its stockholders taxable upon their shares. There is a respectable body of opinion, a minority larger in some than in other cases, against these rules.

The Rhode Island statute attacked in the Providence Bank Case imposed a specific tax upon the paid-up capital of all banks. This particular bank, whose charter long antedated the act, resisted the tax upon the ground that the contract expressed in its charter thereby was impaired. The tax was sustained upon the ground that the power of the state to tax the bank was unhampered inasmuch as no exemption in so many words had been given in the charter. Suppose, said the counsel for the bank, in his argument against this tax, that the bank had paid $50,000 for the privileges it enjoys at the time of receiving its charter, could it be compelled to pay for them again? How does it alter the case that payment was in benefits of another kind, which the state acknowledges to have received. Suppose this franchise to have been a free gift, can payment be subsequently demanded?

The decision is sharply criticized in Angell & Ames on Private Corporations (§§ 465-470), where it is said that the court misapprehended the claim urged in behalf of the bank. These writers insist that the tax laid was a franchise tax for the privilege of doing business as a bank in a corporate capacity, and that privilege the state had parted with and could not resume or burden. That, as this franchise was created by the charter, the right to tax it, unlike the right to tax land granted, never existed, and must have been expressly reserved in the grant, or it never attached at all. They conceded the taxability of the property of the bank to the same extent that other property was taxable. And they conceded, too, that no exemption from a property tax arose without explicit language granting it, and that it need not be reserved. The critics deem their contention sustained by the after decision in Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529, holding that the payment of a specific price in money by a bank for the franchise its charter gave it prevented the state from arbitrarily adding to that price under the guise of taxing the franchise it had sold.

There is nothing that can be added to this criticism to strengthen the argument against the validity of the tax on the Providence Bank. Everybody will concede that when a state grants to a citizen a tangible piece of property, — a section of the public lands, for instance, — that afterwards it may tax such land as it taxes other land, unless it has contracted not to do so. It will be freely conceded that such right to tax is wholly unaffected by the circumstance that a higher or lower price, or none at all, has been paid for the conveyance; in other words, that land owners are equally taxable, whether their titles come from the state or from private persons. It is not so clear that the state, having called a privilege into being and given it away, can still make a charge for permitting it to be enjoyed.

The authorities, except the Gordon Case, 3 How. 133, 11 L. ed. 529, plainly so hold. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. ed. 339; Portland Bank v. Apthorp, 12 Mass. 252; People v. Detroit & P. R. Co. 1 Mich. 458.

The argument against the power of the legislature of a state to alienate beyond the power to resume the right to tax, which was involved in the long contest in which Ohio was defeated in the United States Supreme Court, is a very strong one. It runs to this: A corporate charter is a grant from the Crown to individual subjects, and therefore a contract between the King and his subjects, the grantees, equally binding upon both. The King may not resume the thing granted; he may not grant the same thing to another. But the taxing power was in Parliament, never in the King. The Crown could not bargain or grant the taxing power away. And, as every Parliament was unrestricted, no Parliament could tie the hands of its successors. An American legislature grants charters in the exercise of the royal prerogatives, and it parts with the rights of the Crown when it does; but it does not, and cannot, touch the parliamentary powers.

Mr. Justice Catron, in his dissent in the case of Piqua Branch of State Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369, 14 L. ed. 977, argues that, whatever may be true of legislatures generally, that of Ohio in 1845 had not the power to surrender the right to tax. The Constitution of that state, in reserving to the people all powers not vice of that decision is that it looked exclusively to the word "subject" in § 13, art. 12, and failed to give force and effect to the words, "the same as that of individuals." When we say that the court's construction of the word "subject" attributed to it some supposed magical effect, we are simply reiterating the language of Chalmers, J. He said (56 Miss. 69): "I find no such magic as my colleague in the words, 'shall be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals.' To me they have no meaning other than that which would be conveyed by the equivalent phrases 'shall be viewed in the matter of taxation' or 'shall be treated' or 'shall be dealt with' 'the same as that of individuals,' or 'shall be liable to taxation the same as that of individuals.' These, and many similar phrases which might perhaps be suggested, all convey but one and the same idea, namely, that the lawgiver, in the imposition of taxes, shall know no difference between the property of individuals and that of corporations for pecuniary profit." The opinion of the court declares as its gist that § 13 was not mandatory upon the legislature to tax the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit whenever the property of individuals was taxed. It distinctly put the property of such private corporations, as to the power to tax them or exempt them, in a class by themselves, distinct from the class of individuals. In other words, it held that, although the property of individuals might be taxed, yet the property of such corporations might be at the same time exempted by the legislature from taxation; provided such exemption extended to all corporations of the same class in the state. We think it is perfectly manifest that the language, "the same as the property of individuals," imperatively commanded the legislature, whenever they tax the property of private individuals, to tax also the property of such corporations, and under the same rules of equality and expressly conferred, deprived the legislature, in his opinion, of such power. At all events, the Ohio supreme court had so interpreted the Ohio Constitution, and, whether its construction was sound or not, it was final. The concession that such construction might, possibly, be an unsound one somewhat weakened the dissent. One sees, here, the influence of the idea of state sovereignty,—an idea much more influential then than now.

Mr. Justice Miller of the same court in later years was generally consistent in denying the power of the state to surrender the right to tax, although in the more recent cases he acknowledged the controlling authority of the contrary decisions. One is a little surprised, therefore, to find him, in concurring in the result, but dissenting from the reasoning, of Swayne, J., in a case involving a supposed surrender of the police power, thus expressing himself: The question turns upon the existence of a contract and its nature, and not upon the power of the legislature to pass laws affecting the health and comfort of the community. Reference to the latter, and to the power of repeal and modification where no contract is in question, are irrelevant. It is said that such contract as may be found in the present case was made subject to the police power of the legislature over the class of subjects to which it relates. The extent to which this is true depends upon the specific character of the contract, and not on the general doctrine. This court has repeatedly decided that a state may, by contract, bargain away her right of taxation. I have not concurred in this view, but it is the settled law of this court. If a state may make a contract upon that subject which it cannot abrogate or repeal, it may, with far more reason, make a contract for a limited time for the removal of a continuing nuisance from a populous city. The nuisance in the case before us was the very subject-matter of the contract. The consideration of the contract was that defendant should do certain things which affected the health and comfort of the community; and the legislature can no more impair the obligation of that contract than it can resume the right of taxation it has on valid consideration agreed not to exercise, because in either case its wisdom has become doubtful. Northwestern Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. ed. 1036. 60 L. R. A.

The New Jersey cases holding that a general statute enacting that all thereafter granted corporate charters shall be open to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the will of any subsequent legislature does not prevent a subsequent legislature from making an irrepealable charter contract in relation to taxation if it so elects (New Jersey v. Yard, 95 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 352; State v. Heppenheimer, 58 N. J. L. 633, 32 L. R. A. 643, 34 Atl. 1061; Hancock v. Singer Mfg. Co. 62 N. J. L. 280, 42 L. R. A. 852, 41 Atl. 846), are reconciled with some difficulty with the case of Louisville Water Co. v. Clark, 143 U. S. 1, 36 L. ed. 55, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 346.

The rule which seems to be established by the last case without impairing too far the authority of the others may be stated thus: Given a general statute reserving the right to alter, amend, or repeal all thereafter granted corporate charters, a charter with a tax exemption in it, granted while it is in force, will, if silent upon that point, be open to alteration, amendment, or repeal, but will not be affected thereby if cast in express terms in the form of an irrepealable contract.

There is no necessary conflict between the cases of State, Morris & E. R. Co., Prosecutor, v. Railroad Taxation Comrs. 37 N. J. L. 228, and Petersburg R. Co. v. Northampton, 81 N. C. 487. The former held that a subsequent general tax act was so inconsistent in its terms with the charter tax provisions that both could not stand, and therefore that the tax act operated as a repealer of the charter to that extent. The latter held that there was no inconsistency between the North Carolina tax act and the charter tax provisions, but, on the contrary, the tax act contained expressions indicating an intent to make no change, so that both act and charter might well stand together.

The distinction sometimes made with respect of the rule of strict construction between statutes substituting a system of commuted and special in lieu of general taxation applying in particular to a corporation or a class of corporations, and laws releasing such a body or class absolutely from all taxation, has a reasonable foundation. It cannot, however, be said that it has yet been erected into a general principle.

J. B. G.

uniformity. It was well said by Campbell, J., that this provision of § 13 "sprang from the experience that corporations were in the habit of asking and obtaining legislative exemption from liability to taxation." 56 Miss. 56. That experience the state had acquired in the thirty-seven years elapsing between the Constitution of 1832 and the Constitution of 1869, and that experience was wisely availed of to put an end to the grant of exclusive privileges to such corporations. It marked a new era in the history of corporate taxation in this state. It laid down a fundamental new line of great public policy,—one that will be found essential to the preservation of the rights of the people, as is abundantly attested by the experience of older states dealing with such corporations. It is that feature of the decisions, thus holding that this § 13 merely permitted the taxation of such corporations, but did not require that taxation whenever the property of individuals was taxed, and in just the same manner, in all respects, as the property of private individuals was taxed, which we now condemn and overrule. In no other respect do we interfere with the decision in that case. That case decided, and properly decided, that under the Constitution of 1869 the legislature had the power to select for exemption from taxation certain designated kinds of property, such as the agricultural implements of farmers, the tools of the mechanic, etc. Such exemption of particular kinds of property, for reasons of public policy, the Constitution allowed the legislature to grant, and, when granted, it applied to such property, whether owned by individuals or such corporations. And to permit such exemptions was perfectly consistent with holding that said section mandatorily required the legislature to tax the property of such corporations whenever and just as it taxed the property of individuals. The vice of the holding of the court was in disregarding and repudiating the correlation by the Constitution of the property of such corporations and the property of private individuals in the same category as to the right to tax and the duty to tax, and in declaring that under that section the legislature might put into operation a scheme of taxation which taxed property of all the private individuals in the state, and at the same time, at the will of the legislature, exempt all property of such corporations from any taxation whatever. The Constitution plainly and clearly yoked together indissolubly the property of such corporations and the property of individuals, and subjected both alike to the same taxation, to be imposed under the same rules of equality or uniformity. The legislature might not exempt all the property of private corporations for pecuniary profit, and tax all the property of private individuals, but it might exempt certain selected kinds of property, in pursuance of a wise public policy, whether that property belonged to such corporations or to private individuals.

One other observation. The case before us most emphatically does not present a claim to exemption under a charter identical with the charter in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, nor the case of any corporation which has acted on the faith of a decision construing a charter identical with the charter in the case of Mississippi Mills v. Cook, and which might thus be said to constitute, for such corporation, acting on it and investing its capital on it, a rule of property. It will be time enough to decide that precise question when that question shall be presented.

Whence did we get § 13, art. 12, of the Constitution of 1869? It is said in Mississippi Mills v. Cook that we got it from the constitution of Iowa. The clauses in the Constitution of Iowa and Constitution of Mississippi of 1869 are identical on this subject, and the supreme court of Iowa in Davenport v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 635, and Dubuque v. Illinois C. R. Co. 39 Iowa, 56, expressly decided that this identical section prohibited the legislature from exempting the property of corporations from the same taxes imposed on the property of individuals, and that the property of corporations must be taxed whenever that of individuals was taxed.

The Constitution of Alabama, in Mobile v. Stonewall Ins. Co. 53 Ala. 570, declared that the provision was in itself self-executing, without the aid, in fact, in restraint, of legislative power, subjecting corporate property to the taxation imposed on individuals; and expressly declared, further, that if property of a particular kind is subjected to taxation, and owned by a corporation, it must bear the rate of taxation imposed on individuals.

The Constitution of California contains an identical provision, and in the case of People v. McCreery (1868) 34 Cal. 432, the supreme court of California announced the same construction held in Iowa and Alabama, expressly overruling early decisions to the contrary, just as we do here. The Constitutions of Arkansas and Florida contain similar provisions, and the supreme courts of those states announced the same construction which we here announce.

When, therefore, § 13 of the Constitution of 1869 was adopted in this state it was written in the organic law of our land, bringing with it the same meaning precisely, under well-settled rules of construction, which it had in the state from which it came here. And the same construction was unanimously approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in four concurring decisions rendered in November, 1883, March, 1885, April, 1893, and March, 1894, to wit: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Palmes, 109 U. S. 248-254, 27 L. ed. 924-926, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 113 U. S. 475, 28 L. ed. 1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529; New York ex rel. Schurz v. Cook, 148 U. S. 408, 37 L. ed. 502, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645; Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 303, 304, 310-312, 38 L. ed. 451, 452, 454, 455, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592.

In overruling this feature of the decision in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, therefore, we were announcing a rule of construction supported by four decisions of the United States Supreme Court and by the decisions of five state supreme courts, as against a rule of construction announced in no case in this Union except Mississippi Mills v. Cook. We have all proper respect for the doctrine of stare decisis, but it is a doctrine not inflexible, and departed from over and over by the wisest courts in proper cases. And if the doctrine of stare decisis can be disregarded in proper cases, where the question is one merely of property rights between individuals, how much stronger is the reason for disregarding it when so to do results, as here, in restoring to a sovereign state the right to tax corporations, and make them bear their just share of the burdens of that government whose protection they so constantly and persistently invoke. This distinction is not one of our invention. It is well settled in the law, and it was voiced in words, which we quote, to approve, by Chief Justice George in Lombard v. Lombard, 57 Miss. 177, who said: "Speaking for myself alone, I would say that on constitutional questions, where the former decision refused a right reserved to individuals as against the power of the government, or where it impaired the powers of the people or their representatives to prevent maladministration by their officers and agents, or sanctioned an alienation by the legislature of powers conferred for the public good, I should feel little hesitation in departing from it, when satisfied of its incorrectness." And in Beck v. Allen, 58 Miss. 173, Judge George, delivering the opinion of the court, overruled two previous decisions on the same point, justifying departure from the rule of stare decisis, by the very distinction here referred to, the case being one involving the taxing power. In concluding this ground of decision, we repeat that it is wholly independent of the first ground of decision hereinbefore elaborated, and, whether we are right or wrong in the view announced in this second ground, the exemption must be denied, looking to the first alone.

In our summary of the holdings in this case, we said there were other views leading to the same conclusion, which we might embrace in the opinion. We proceed to notice these. We come now to a third ground of decision, and that is this: That the exemption claimed here under said 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern charter, whether applied to the property of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad alone, or to the other property of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, has been repealed by legislation, certainly since the Code of 1892 went into effect. It was declared in the Lambert Case, 70 Miss. 787, 13 So. 33, through Judge Campbell (the author of the Code of 1880), that, by the Code of 1880, each railroad in this state was subjected to taxation. That Code, therefore, repealed all railroad exemptions then existing. The Lambert Case further held that by the act of 1884, p. 29, the exemption of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad was restored, and that by the act of 1890, p. 12, if it then existed, it was continued. An examination of all the statutes on the subject, which are as follows: Code 1880, §§ 596-606, inclusive; Id. §§ 607, 608; Acts 1886, § 6, p. 23; Acts 1888, p. 49; Acts 1890, p. 12; Code 1892, §§ 3379, 3875; Id. 3744,—will show that the scheme propounded by the legislature was, up to the Code of 1892, this: That railroad companies should pay ad valorem taxes unless they should accept the conditional exemption provided in the privilege tax law in lieu of the ad valorem tax, and manifest their acceptance of the law providing this conditional exemption from ad valorem taxation by putting such acceptance in writing, and annually paying the privilege tax specified. The provisions of law respecting such conditional exemption from ad valorem taxation by accepting the privilege tax imposed in lieu thereof, and paying it, run side by side through all the legislation from the Code of 1880 to the Code of 1892. The scheme was that ad valorem taxes should be paid by all railroads in the state, but that any railroad should be exempt from such ad valorem taxes which would pay the privilege tax provided in the various acts, provided it manifested its acceptance of such exemption in writing and paid such privilege tax. As to the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, the Code of 1880, as shown, repealed its special exemption in its special charter by §§ 597-606, and placed its conditional exemption from ad valorem taxation upon acceptance manifested in writing, and upon payment of the privilege tax thenceforward, under the general law of the state, thus withdrawing any right that the railroad company had to claim a special exemption under this special charter. And whether it had an exemption from ad valorem taxes thenceforward was to be determined, not by reference to a special charter, but by reference to the general law on the subject of privilege taxes, enacted from time to time. The act of 1884, in fixing the privilege taxes, did, however, restore, by recognition, to the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company the exemption of its charter according to the opinion in the Lambert Case. As the act of 1884 did not pretend to affect §§ 597-606, Code 1880, in imposing ad valorem taxes, but only §§ 606-608, relating to the privilege taxes, it is to our mind quite doubtful whether the act of 1884 did have the effect to restore the charter exemption; but, conceding that it did, it is strange that the court in the Lambert Case overlooked the act of 1886, p. 23, § 6, amending the "privilege tax" chapter, Code 1880, fixing the privilege taxes to be paid by each railroad in the state, and expressly declaring "that hereafter said railroad companies shall pay privilege taxes respectively 25 per centum greater per mile than is fixed in said acts," without once alluding to any exemption of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad or any other railroad. Clearly, if the exemption of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company was restored by the act of 1884, it was repealed by said act of 1886, and was not in existence from that time until the act of 1890 was passed. The act of 1890 (p. 12) amended the act of 1884, and then re-enacted it as amended. This seems to have been an ingenious effort on the part of some one who knew that the act of 1886 had repealed the exemption of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, recognized in the act of 1884, to again restore it by an effort to repeal the act of 1886, without disclosing the fact or referring to the act of 1886. But the holding in the Lambert Case is that the act of 1890 continued the exemption, if it existed; and, since it is clearly shown that no exemption existed when the act of 1890 was passed, there was no exemption to be continued, and the act of 1890, under the rules of construction with reference to taxation, most certainly cannot be held to have created then anew such exemption. It follows from this that when the Constitution of 1890 was adopted the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad had no exemption, and consequently § 181 of the Constitution had no effect to continue the exemption which was not then in existence. When the Code of 1892 was adopted, the legislature, carrying out the mandate of the Constitution of 1890, § 90h, expressly provided, in § 3379, that the privilege tax should be imposed on all railroads, without a suggestion of any exemption to any; and this Code was a revision of all general laws on the subject, and wholly omitted all the provisions of the acts of 1884 and 1890 in respect to exemptions. The scheme of the taxation, up to the Code of 1892, was that railroad companies might escape ad valorem taxation by accepting the provisions of the law as to privilege taxes, in writing, and paying the same. The scheme of taxation, under the Code of 1892, changed all this, and repealed all former exemptions of all railroads from taxation by said § 3379 and said § 3875. A consideration showing that this was the purpose of the legislature is the smallness of the privilege tax, under § 3379, no longer in lieu of ad valorem taxes, as compared with its amount under former laws. The Code of 1892 provides for the exemption of all property which is to be exempt in § 3744, and railroads are not mentioned in that section. The provision of that section is as follows: "The following property and no other shall be exempt from taxation,"—which declaration is as positive and emphatic an exclusion of all railroad exemptions as language can furnish. But not only did § 3379 of said Code impose privilege taxes, but § 3875 imposed ad valorem taxes. By that section, every railroad company in the state, without exception, was required to return all its property within and without this state, with its value, so that the assessors might know what value should be the basis of state, county, and municipal taxation, and the section further declares, as to railroads, that all of its property, real and personal, taxable and nontaxable, shall be included. The word "nontaxable," in this connection, does not mean exempt property, but property like government bonds, that is not taxable at all; and this is made plain by the provision at the close of the section, "that if the said property is claimed to be exempt from taxation it shall be separately stated and the law cited under which the claim is made." In other words, they were to return three classes of property,—taxable property; nontaxable property, that is, property that could not be taxed in its nature; and exempt property, if any, citing the law for the exemption. The word "nontaxable," therefore, creates no exemption, and does not describe exempt property, which is otherwise provided for, but means merely, as stated, property like government bonds, that cannot be taxed at all. So that we hold that certainly since the Code of 1892 went into effect, and, as we think, since the act of 1886, the exemptions set up by the railroad company in this case were repealed by the legislature, and on this ground, independently of any other ground heretofore set out, the exemptions must be denied.

4. Counsel for the state revenue agent presents another very ingenious view to this effect: That the 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern charter was plainly prospective, and intended to carry the benefit of the exemption therein provided only to a company which should build a railroad after the grant to it of the exemption. We think it is entirely clear that said provision was prospective, and that the consideration to the state for the grant of the exemption was that recited in the act, to wit: "The construction of the railroads provided for therein and the great benefit which the state would receive in the development of its agricultural resources by means of said railroads as works of internal improvement, and also the increased value which would thereby be added to the property of the state, thus enabling the state to greatly increase its revenue without burdensome taxation upon the people." That was the consideration to the state; that clearly was the reason and object of the statute. So far we agree with counsel. Counsel's argument then proceeds to claim that the act of March 3, 1882, authorized the Memphis & Vicksburg Railroad Company and Mississippi Valley & Ship Island Railroad Company to consolidate, and that the object was to construct a railroad from Memphis, through Vicksburg, to Ship island,—a scheme well known to be dearly cherished by the people of Mississippi for years back. Counsel then proceeds to claim that § 1 of the act of March 3, 1882, in providing that the consolidated company should have all the rights, property, immunities, etc., now possessed by the companies which may enter into such consolidation, merely meant such rights, etc., as belonged to the companies existent at the date of the passage of the act; that as the Baton Rouge Railroad Company was not chartered until March 9, 1882, it was not contemplated that that company should be a constituent member of the consolidation; and that § 5, p. 1015., Acts 1882, was meant by the legislature to extend the exemption of said § 21 to such road only as the consolidated company

—the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company—might build after it came into existence; and that, as said company did not come into existence until after the road from Memphis to New Orleans was completed, it is a perversion of the spirit and purpose of the legislature to allow the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company to blanket this exemption over a road which was never built by it, and in the construction of which it incurred no indebtedness. This is certainly very persuasive, but we do not now decide whether it is a correct contention or not.

Another contention of counsel for the revenue agent, worthy of serious consideration, is this: That taking the charter of the Baton Rouge Company and the Memphis & Vicksburg Company, as written into the charter of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Company, as part thereof, the legislation of the state shows that it was the purpose of the legislature to extend this exemption of the 21st section to the company created by the first consolidation, the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, but to exclude it from the present Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company, the result of the second consolidation. Counsel's argument on this point is about as follows: That conceding that the 1st section of the act of March 3, 1882 (the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas charter), contained the word "immunity," and that by virtue thereof the exemption of the said 21st section passed to the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, the only authority for any future consolidation of the said Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company with the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company is to be found in § 16 of the Baton Rouge charter, and § 25 of the Memphis & Vicksburg charter, and that in both these sections the legislature intentionally omitted the word "immunity," and any other words equivalent thereto, and that this omission conclusively shows that it was the purpose of the legislature to limit the existence of the exemption provided by said 21st section to the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, the result of the consolidation of the Memphis & Vicksburg Railroad Company and the Baton Rouge Railroad Company, only so long as it retained its existence as the said Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas Railroad Company, and not indefinitely to pass this exemption along to all future consolidations. Counsel has so succinctly stated the facts on this subject that we cannot do better than to quote that part of his brief, which is as follows: "All of these sections thus put in the same charter demonstrate that it was the purpose of the legislature to pass the exemption into the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas under the word 'immunities,' but to withhold it from any future consolidation by omitting the word 'immunities,' in said §§ 16 and 25, and by using therein no words to indicate the intention of passing the exemption to any future consolidation. But, in this connection, the court will bear in mind that the act of 1890, as to the sale of the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad, on which the Lambert Case is based, used the word 'immunities,' as elsewhere shown. When the legislature passed the act of March 3, 1882 (the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas charter), it necessarily had in mind the provisions of the charters of the Memphis & Vicksburg Company and the Mississippi Valley & Ship Island Company, because both of these companies are mentioned in the very beginning of the act, and it was passed for their express benefit; and the legislature made these charters necessary parts of the act, because, by its terms, it could not be made effectual without the charters of said consolidated company be taken and held to be parts of this act." "Said Mississippi Valley & Ship Island Railroad Company was incorporated in 1871 (Acts 1871, p. 237) as the Vicksburg, Pensacola, & Ship Island Railroad Company. In 1873 its name was changed to Mississippi Valley & Ship Island Railroad Company (Acts 1873, p. 562). The 15th section of the original charter of this company gave the power of consolidation (Acts 1871, p. 247), but omits the word 'immunities,' and gives no power to vest in the consolidated company the exemption from taxation contained in the 21st section of the charter. Besides, the amendatory act of 1873, which vested this exemption from taxation in the charter as amended, uses the word 'immunities' in § 1, p. 562, Acts 1873. The charter of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company uses the word 'immunities' to embrace exemption from taxation. Acts 1882, § 5, p. 843. The amendment of the Yazoo & Mississippi Valley Railroad Company charter (Acts 1884, § 3, p. 985) uses the word 'immunities' for the same purpose. The amendment of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas charter (Acts 1884, p. 936) uses the word 'immunities' for the same purpose. All these things were in the mind of the legislature as parts of said act of March 3, 1882, and show they used the word 'immunities' advisedly, and did not intend that any exemption should pass into any future consolidation, after the formation of the Louisville, New Orleans, & Texas, and this § 15 of the Mississippi Valley & Ship Island Railroad Company expressly provided that any consolidation should form one company, and have a joint common stock."

Certainly the significance counsel seeks to have attached to the omission of the word "immunity" in the act referred to seems fully borne out by the opinion of Mr. Justice Peckham in Phoenix F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Tennessee, 161 U. S., at page 177, 40 L. ed. at page 661, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 471; but we decline now to pass definitely upon this contention.

There is also much force in another view presented by counsel for the revenue agent, to the effect that, since 1888, the proof in the record shows that the railroad company had been able to declare and pay the annual dividend of 8 per cent upon even its fictitious capital stock over and above its fixed charges on the proper construction debt. But to go into this would protract this opinion beyond anything necessary for present decision.

There is a rather curious proposition of counsel for the railroad companies in his brief at page 118 et seq. The argument is that what was provided by the 21st section of the Northwestern charter was not an ordinary exemption at all, although counsel admits that the Lambert Case expressly so decided, but that it was a contract of appropriation, irrepealable in its nature, and not an exemption at all. If counsel's contention as to this is sound, then it is perfectly plain that the claim of rule of property and vested right, under former decisions of this court, falls at once to the ground; for no one will contend that this court has ever treated the said 21st section as an appropriation by contract, irrepealable in its nature. Counsel's construction is therefore utterly inconsistent with the reiterated claim that the view we take is trenching upon any rule of property laid down in any previous decision rendered by this court. This is the first time that such a construction was ever presented to this court or asserted in any form.

Finally, all the judges concur that, because of the inconsistent compromise verdict, the judgment must be reversed, both on appeal and the cross appeal.

The judgment is reversed, both on appeal and the cross appeal, and verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Woods, Ch. J., dissents.

A petition to strike the above opinion from the files, because not filed within proper time, having been made, Whitfield, J., on November 28, 1898, handed down the following response:

Section 4352 and § 4381 of the Code of 1892 were fully complied with by the summary of holdings handed down in June last, certified to and used in the circuit court on the trial of the case after it was remanded. Every reason for decision contained in that summary is also set out in the opinion filed recently, insisted on, and enforced. 77 Miss. 194, ante, 33, 24 So. 200. The court has receded from no position in that summary announced. It has added one new reason, and one only, for the decision: That the exemption was repealed by legislation, to wit, the act of 1886, and the provisions of the Code of 1892. With this single exception, the reasons given for decision in the summary are identical with the reasons given in the opinion now on file. And it is too plain for argument that, had the new reason for decision now set out in the opinion been also set out in the summary, the circuit court would merely have had one more reason for sustaining the action it took. The railroad companies were not, and could not possibly have been, prejudiced by the fact that the summary did not contain this additional reason. Nor is it now, nor can it be, prejudiced by the fact that the opinion does not contain this one additional reason for our decision.

Other views of counsel are adverted to in the opinion, but it is distinctly declared that as to them we decide nothing,—not adopting them in any wise as reasons for decision. Moreover, we distinctly stated in the summary: "There are other views, leading to the same conclusion, which we may embrace in the opinion yet to be filed. What we have said is a mere summary of the holdings set forth." And at the last term of this court a motion was made to have a fuller opinion handed down then, before the trial in the circuit court, based on § 4352, Code 1892, which we overruled on the ground that the summary was a sufficient compliance with that section, and should stand as the opinion of the court for the time being. The argument made then, and repeated now, as to this, was that the law requires the opinion to accompany the mandate, and that the court below could not proceed without both. This point was disposed of adversely to this contention in Foster v. Jordan, 54 Miss. 510, the court saying: "This is an erroneous conception of the province of the mandate. It is the judgment of this court reversing and remanding a case which gives the lower court authority to enter upon a new trial." And the opinion of this court is not more necessary to the jurisdiction of the circuit court than the mandate. Both are mere matters of practice. Beyond this, the scope of the motion is to assert the proposition that this court has not the power, after the trial of a remanded cause, in any way to revise, add to, or take from the mere reasons for its decision, even though the reason added or taken away in no wise affected the party losing in the lower court prejudicially. That, precisely and exactly, is the proposition asserted. It is hardly necessary to say that this wholly novel and extraordinary proposition is untenable. This court, of equal and co-ordinate dignity with the legislative and executive departments in matters judicial, "uttering the voice and registering the will of the state," is reduced to no such pitiable plight. The very question here presented has been settled by authority over and over again. In Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24, 73 Am. Dec. 565, Mr. Justice Field, afterwards on the Supreme Bench of the United States, says, for a unanimous court, after citing the statute there relied on, which provided that "all decisions given upon an appeal . . . shall be given in writing, with the reasons therefor, and filed with the clerk of the court:" "It will not be impertinent to the matter under consideration to say a few words as to the control of the court over its opinions and records. There are some misapprehensions on the subject, arising chiefly from a confusion of terms, and from a misconception of the relation of the different departments of government to each other, and the entire independence in its line of duties of the judiciary. The terms 'opinions' and 'decisions' are often confounded, yet there is a wide difference between them, and in ignorance of this, or by overlooking it, what has been a mere revision of an opinion has been sometimes regarded as a mutilation of a record. A decision of the court is its judgment. The opinion is the reasons given for that judgment. The former is entered of record immediately upon its rendition, and can only be changed through a regular application to the court upon a petition for a rehearing or a modification. The latter is the property of the judges, subject to their revision, correction, and modification in any particular deemed advisable, until, with the approbation of the writer, it is transcribed in the records. . . . All these errors, whether in language, form, or substance, should be corrected before a publication is permitted as an authoritative exposition of the law, and as such binding upon the court. . . . In no civilized state, excepting California, has the existence of this power ever been doubted. Every judge, from the chief justice of the Supreme Court of the United States down, claims and exercises without question the right of revision, including thereby modification and partial suppression of his opinions. . . . When the opinions have been revised, and finally approved and recorded, then they cease to be the subject of change." There has been no suppression here. The majority of the court have receded from no position announced in the summary, but positively affirm every one of them in the opinion. And that this is so we here make part of this opinion that summary, in its entirety, so that a comparison of it with the opinion now on file may show the facts as they are. That summary is as follows:

"Whitfield, J.: First. Because of the inconsistent compromise verdict, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, on the appeal and the cross appeal.

"Second. The Lambert Case, 70 Miss. 779, 13 So. 33, is res judicata as to the taxes for the year 1892 on all the property that originally belonged to the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, which was in Adams county; and, being res judicata, it is, as to that, beyond our power to overrule it.

"Third. The Lambert Case is not res judicata as to any of the other taxes here involved, on the property that once belonged to the Natchez, Jackson, & Columbus Railroad Company, or on any of the other property here involved.

"Fourth. The Lambert Case did decide that § 180 of the Constitution of 1890 did not cut off the exemption from taxation asserted in this case, on the ground that this is a case of mere merger, and not of consolidation; that the resultant corporation was not a new corporation,—and applied the principles of Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 130, 29 L. ed. 833, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 649, which is, beyond all controversy, a clear case of simple merger, and not of consolidation; taking 'merger,' proper, to mean the absorption of one corporation by another, the autonomy of the absorbing corporation being preserved, without the formation of a new company, and 'consolidation,' proper, to mean such union of two corporations as results in a third new corporation, under whatever name. We hold that the clear legislative purpose was (using the words in the sense indicated) consolidation, and not merger, yet consolidation in such sense as to result in the formation of a new corporation, and, besides, that what was actually done here was necessarily the creation of a new corporation, and not mere merger; that, hence, the principles of the Whitworth Case do not apply, but the principles of Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 301, 38 L. ed. 450, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592, do apply; that, consequently, the Constitution of 1890, § 180, cut off the exemption; that the Lambert Case cannot be upheld, and should be, and is hereby, overruled. If it be conceded that the purpose aimed at by the articles of agreement of the railroad company was mere merger, it is not to be permitted that the company could overthrow the purpose of the legislature to authorize consolidation, and not merger, nor to name that 'merger' which the actual things done show was consolidation. Consolidation is a privilege, to be exercised or not, not a contract. Section 181 of the Constitution, and § 279 of the schedule thereto, merely mean that corporations existing at the adoption of the Constitution, having then exemptions or other 'rights,' should have them 'continue' so long as such corporations retained the precise corporate existence they then had. The new corporation here takes its life, as from a new grant of corporate life, from the date of the consolidation.

"But we hold further than the 21st section of the Mobile & Northwestern Railroad Company's charter was an effort to secure, as is expressly recited in its face, an irrepealable grant of exemption, and violative of the Constitution of 1869, art. 12, § 13, and article 12, § 20, even as construed in Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40. The exemption claimed in Mississippi Mills v. Cook had no irrepealable feature.

"But, again, we hold that such section violated said clauses of said Constitution, even had it not been irrepealable. Mississippi Mills v. Cook turned upon some supposed magical distinction, in the particular connection, between the words 'subject' and 'subjected,' and sacrificed a great constitutional principle to a piece of mere verbal jugglery. Precisely the same clause, using precisely the same word, 'subject,' occurs in the Constitution of Florida and Arkansas; and the supreme courts of both states held, in precisely identical contention, that the clause forbade exemption from taxation of 'corporations for pecuniary profit,' and both of these decisions were, on this identical proposition, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Berry, 41 Ark. 509, 113 U. S. 475, 28 L. ed. 1058, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 529; Palmer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 19 Fla. 231, 109 U. S. 253, 254, 27 L. ed. 925, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193. And this construction is reaffirmed in Keokuk & W. R. Co. v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 310, 311, 38 L. ed. 454, 455, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 592. The word 'subject' should have been given its plain, popular signification, occurring in the connection it did, in a great popular instrument, the Constitution,—the very signification attached to it by the Supreme Court of the United States. We prefer to align ourselves now with that court in this matter, and overrule Mississippi Mills v. Cook on that point. It passes all understanding how the court could gravely hold in Mississippi Mills v. Cook that a solemn declaration in the Constitution of a state, its organic law, formulating fundamentally great lines of public policy, that 'the property of all corporations for pecuniary profit' should be subject to taxation the same as that of individuals, added no new feature, but merely stated what was the law before, and without the declaration, to wit, that the 'property of corporations for pecuniary profit' was liable to taxation. All the world knew that before! Judge Campbell, in his dissenting opinion in Beck v. Allen, 58 Miss., at page 177, most wisely said: 'Subtlety and refinement and astuteness are not admissible to explain away an expression of the sovereign will. . . . The framers of the Constitution, and the people who adopted it, must be understood to have intended the words employed in that sense most likely to arise from them on first reading them.' Doubtless, the rule of stare decisis is a wise rule, and one not lightly to be infringed. But instances justifying its disregard find manifold illustration in the Reports. And, surely, stronger reasons for not applying it can never arise than where, as here, to disregard it restores to the sovereign the exercise of one of the highest attributes of sovereignty,—the taxing power,—and merely requires that corporations for pecuniary profit, constantly demanding and securing the protection of the government, shall also bear their just share of the burdens of taxation.

We feel, therefore, confident of the propriety of overruling, as we now expressly do, the Lambert Case, and the case of Mississippi Mills v. Cook, 56 Miss. 40. There are other views, leading to the same conclusion, which we may embrace in the opinion yet to be filed. What we have said is a mere summary of the holdings set forth. Reversed and remanded."

But the California case is not the only authority. In the appendix to 131 U. S., at page XVIII., it is said: "Judges frequently correct their opinions in the hands of a reporter after a printed copy has been filed with the clerk. . . . If one curious in such things would know how far back this corrective practice has existed, let him look as far back as the seventh volume of Cranch (1st ed.), where he will find corrections made by Mr. Justice Story in the opinion of the court delivered by him in Barnitz v. Casey, 7 Cranch, at page 456, 3 L. ed. 403. In later editions the changes are incorporated in the text. We have examined this first edition, and it is there stated on the page following the table of cases cited in that volume as follows: "Since this volume was printed, Mr. Justice Story has requested that the following corrections and additions should be made in the opinions delivered by him." So that illustrious judge actually corrected and added to his opinion in 7 Cranch after the official volume of Reports had been published. So far as due process of law is concerned, it is too obvious for discussion that it cannot be involved in mere matters of practice of the courts. We conclude with these words of Judge Field in the case cited: "The power over our opinions and the records of our court we shall exercise at all times, while we have the honor to sit on the bench, against all encroachments from any source, but in a manner, we trust, befitting the highest tribunal in the state."

The motion is denied.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

PITTSFIELD COTTONWEAR MANUFACTURING COMPANY

v.

PITTSFIELD SHOE COMPANY.

(.....N. H.....)

1. A landlord is not relieved from liability for injury to tenants of a lower floor by the freezing and bursting of an automatic fire extinguisher in the portion of the building retained by him, by the fact that he has employed an independent contractor to keep the building heated.

2. A tenant of the lower floor of a building, the remainder of which is retained by the landlord, cannot, in an action on the contract, recover for breach by a third person of his contract with the landlord to keep such remainder heated, by reason of which water pipes freeze and burst, to his injury.
3. One who contracts with the owner of a building to keep the portions of it remaining in his possession heated, failure to do which may result in the bursting of water pipes designed for the protection of tenants in possession of lower floors against fire, and in the flooding of their goods, owes the latter the duty of exercising care in the management of the heating apparatus so long as he retains control of it; and he will be liable to a tenant in tort for negligently permitting the fire to go out so that the pipes freeze and burst, to the tenant's injury.

4. One who has undertaken to furnish heat to protect from freezing fire extinguisher pipes in the portion of a building retained by the landlord, where the freezing might result in injury to tenants of a lower floor, is not liable to the tenants for negligently permitting the fire to go out and the pipes to freeze to their injury, if the exercise by the landlord of the ordinary care which he owed the tenants to keep the water from injuring them would have detected the escape of water and prevented the injury, so that failure to exercise it was the proximate cause of the injury.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to a ruling of the Superior Court for Merrimack County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to hold defendant liable for injury to plaintiff's goods through the bursting of a water pipe. Overruled.

From the pleadings it appeared that plaintiff occupied the lower floor of a building known as the Drake & Sanborn mill. The remainder of the mill was in possession of the owner. Defendant occupied another building a short distance away, and between the two was a boiler house designed to furnish heat and power to the two mills. The boilers were connected by piping with the different floors of the Drake & Sanborn mill so that heat could be supplied to it. The owner of this mill had contracted with defendant, who owned the boiler house, to furnish the heat for the building. In the building was an automatic sprinkling device for fire purposes. The heating contract required the furnishing of sufficient heat to prevent the sprinkler pipes from freezing. One night the fires were negligently permitted to go out in the boiler house, and, in consequence, a sprinkler pipe froze and burst, and the water flooded plaintiff's stock to its injury.

The declaration alleged that it was the duty of defendant to exercise reasonable care and prudence in the management of the boiler house and in the maintenance of a proper fire under the boilers, and to furnish sufficient heat to prevent the freezing of the water pipes; and that, if defendant had exercised such care, the pipes would not have burst.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Albin & Shurtleff, for defendant:

This is an action of tort; and it cannot be maintained unless the defendant has violated some duty which it owed to the plaintiff.

If a contract imposes a legal duty upon a person, the neglect of that duty is a tort founded on contract, so that an action ex contractu for the breach of contract, or an action ex delicto for the breach of duty, may be brought at the option of the plaintiff who brings the action; but the plaintiff must be a party to the contract, for no person can, in general, sue in respect of a tort founded on contract who was not a party or privy to, and could not have sued upon, the contract.

Messrs. Sargent, Niles, & Morrill, for plaintiff:

The duty in the present case is not a duty imposed by contract; it is the general duty correlative with the general right of personal security, and of universal application, by which all persons are under obligation, in the management of property, forces, or agencies under their control, to exercise reasonable care to avoid doing injury to the person or property of others.

When there is a violation of a legal right existing independent of any contract between the parties, such as an invasion of a right of property, then the tort is not founded on contract.

1 Addison, Torts, Dudley & B.'s ed. 17.

The right and the corresponding duty being founded on the common law, and existing independent of contract, the fact that the defendant was under a contractual obligation to a third party to exercise the same diligence is no defense to this action.

Bishop, Non-Contract Law, 32.

Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The essence of the fault may lie in omission or commission. The duty is dictated and measured by the exigencies of the occasion.

In actions on the case for negligence in the performance of a contract between the defendant and a third person, to which contract the plaintiff is a stranger, his right to recover for an injury to his person or property depends upon the defendant's negligence being the proximate cause of the injury. And it is the proximate cause unless, between it and the injury, there intervenes such a duty of inquiry in some other person that the failure to make the requisite inquiry constitutes a new efficient, proximate cause of the injury. In the present case there was no such intervening duty of inquiry. The defendant's negligence remains the sole efficient, proximate cause of the injury.

Parsons, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

No claim is made of lack of heat in that part of the premises occupied by the plaintiffs. Whether the occupation of the premises by the plaintiffs, as tenants of the Drake & Sanborn Company, and the consent of the defendants to furnish them with heat, presumed from their continuance in performance with knowledge of the change in occupation, gave the plaintiffs any right in the contract, so far as it related to the premises occupied by them, need not, therefore, be considered. The wrong alleged is the invasion of the plaintiffs' premises, and the injury to their goods, by water flowing from the sprinkler pipes in the attic of the Drake & Sanborn mill. As stated by the plaintiffs' counsel in argument, the complaint is not for "insufficient heat, but because of an excess of water." This legal wrong to the plaintiffs was not dependent upon their occupation of a portion of the Drake & Sanborn mill as tenants to the Drake & Sanborn Company. They would be entitled to protection from such invasion, and to recompense for loss so sustained if they were tenants to another, or occupied adjacent real estate under title in fee.

It has been said that, in ascertaining the "content of the law," "legal duties come before legal rights" (Holmes, Common Law, 219); but, in the administration of the law, there must be found a correlative existence of rights and duties. If there is no wrong without a remedy, there can be no invasion of a legal right for which the law affords a remedy, unless there exists at the same time a legal duty upon some one to prevent or abstain from such invasion. The wrong to the plaintiffs being the incursion of water upon their premises, the next inquiry, in a philosophical search for a remedy, is: Upon whom does the law, upon these facts, impose the duty of preventing the invasion by water from which the plaintiffs suffered?

In the attic of the Drake & Sanborn mill, for a lawful purpose,—protection against fire,—water was so confined and maintained that there was probability of injury to others if it escaped. Upon the parties responsible for the collection and maintenance of this water the law imposes the duty of exercising care to prevent its escape. The care and control of the premises upon which the dangerous condition existed having been surrendered by the owners to others, the responsibility for the failure to exercise such care and control rests with the guilty parties, and not with the owners. Carter v. Berlin Mills Co. 58 N. H. 52, 42 Am. Rep. 572. In this situation, the only duty of the Drake & Sanborn Company toward the plaintiffs—the only right which the plaintiffs could insist upon against them—was the exercise of care to prevent injury to them. They had no ground of complaint if the building were not heated, if by any mechanical device the freezing of the water or its escape if frozen could be prevented, or if by due attention and watchfulness the flow of the water from the frozen or broken pipe into their premises could have been stopped before injury was done. Their right to damages for their injury is not dependent upon the fact of lack of care in heating. Any carelessness by which the water escaped upon them to their injury would have sustained their action.

It is suggested that, because the Drake & Sanborn Company employed an independent contractor to operate the boilers and to furnish them with heat, they were relieved from all liability for an injury to others, which might result from the failure to supply heat to the building. Carter v. Berlin Mills Co. 58 N. H. 52, 42 Am. Rep. 572, is cited. The argument, however, is based upon a misconception of the "independent contractor" rule, as it is called, and the principle of the case cited. The rule is that, where the liability sought to be enforced is based upon the principle of respondere superior, if the person for whose negligence recovery is sought is himself an independent contractor, or the employee of one over whom as to the detail of his work the defendant has no control, liability cannot be enforced by invoking that doctrine. But, where the duty sought to be enforced is one imposed by law upon the defendant, he cannot escape liability by showing that he employed another, over whom he had no control, to perform it for him.

"There are certain absolute duties resting upon natural persons and corporations, either by operation of law, or by reason of having been voluntarily assumed. The law does not permit a person or corporation to cast off such a duty upon an independent contractor so as to exonerate himself or itself for the consequences of its nonperformance. Of this nature is the duty of guarding dangerous substances collected upon their property." 1 Thomp. Neg. § 665; Cabot v. Kingman, 166 Mass. 403, 406, 33 L. R. A. 45, 44 N. E. 344. A master cannot relieve himself of any nondelegable duty owed by him to his servants by contracting for its performance. Story v. Concord & M. R. Co. 70 N. H. 364, 368, 48 Atl. 288; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 532. A railroad corporation cannot relieve itself from responsibilities imposed by law, as a part of its franchise, by contracting for the exercise of part of its authority by an independent contractor. Rolfe v. Boston & M. R. Co. 69 N. H. 476, 45 Atl. 251.

"Unquestionably, no one can be made liable for an act or breach of duty unless it be traceable to himself or his servant or servants in the course of his or their employment. Consequently, if an independent contractor is employed to do a lawful act, and in the course of the work he or his servants commit some casual act of wrong or negligence, the employer is not answerable. . . . That rule is, however, inapplicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do, or, by a parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is intrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned." Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. N. S. 470, 480.

In Carter v. Berlin Mills Co. 58 N. H. 52, 42 Am. Rep. 572, the damage did not occur because the act which the Thurstons were employed to do was unlawful, nor because of the unlawful or improper construction of the dams. It was due to the improper use of the dams by the Thurstons. As the Berlin Mills had no control over the manner of use of the constructions by the Thurstons,—as the Thurstons were not their servants,—they were not liable for their careless acts, and, as no other ground of liability except that of respondere superior was suggested, the plaintiffs failed. The duty imposed upon the Drake & Sanborn Company was to exercise care to prevent the incursion of water upon the plaintiffs' property. They are not excused by the fact that they employed others, over whom they retained no control, to exercise this care for them. Because the Drake & Sanborn Company are liable, it does not necessarily follow that the defendants are not. But the consideration that the primary duty (the violation of which resulted in the injury complained of) rested upon the Drake & Sanborn Company may be important upon the question which may arise hereafter, whether the plaintiffs' injury was caused by the fault of the defendants.

"Actionable negligence is the neglect of a legal duty. The defendants are not liable unless they owed to the plaintiff a legal duty which they neglected to perform. With purely moral obligations the law does not deal. . . . To bring the case within the category of actionable negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty." Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co. 69 N. H. 257, 260, 44 Atl. 809, 810. The duty must be one owed by the defendants to the plaintiffs in respect to the very matter or act charged as negligence. Leavitt v. Mudge Shoe Co. 69 N. H. 597, 45 Atl. 558; McGill v. Maine & N. H. Granite Co. 70 N. H. 125, 46 Atl. 684; Morrison v. Burgess Sulphite Fibre Co. 70 N. H. 406, 47 Atl. 412; Davis v. Boston & M. R. Co. 70 N. H. 519, 520, 49 Atl. 108.

It is alleged in the plaintiffs' declaration that it was the duty of the defendants to exercise care and prudence in the operation of the boilers, and to furnish sufficient steam to heat the Drake & Sanborn mill, and to prevent the freezing of the water in the pipes therein. As the duty, the breach of which constitutes actionable negligence, is one imposed by law, the mere allegation of the duty is insufficient to establish it. The question remains whether, upon the facts stated, the law imposes the duty. 1 Chitty, Pl. 370; Seymour v. Maddox, 16 Q. B. 326; Kennedy v. Morgan, 57 Vt. 46; Marvin Safe Co. v. Ward, 46 N. J. L. 19, 23.

It is alleged that, at the time of the injury complained of, the defendants were under contract with the Drake & Sanborn Company to furnish sufficient steam to heat their mill; but this allegation does not make out a cause of action in favor of these plaintiffs against the present defendants. It discloses a duty on the part of the defendants to heat the building; but this duty was to the Drake & Sanborn Company, and to no one else. Nothing is better settled than that an action will not lie in favor of any third party for a breach of duty so created. Loose v. Clute, 51 N. Y. 494, 10 Am. Rep. 638; Necker v. Harvey, 49 Mich. 517, 14 N. W. 503; Winterbottom v. Wright, 10 Mees. & W. 109; Longmeid v. Holliday, 6 Exch. 761; Heaven v. Pender, L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 503. The plaintiffs concede in argument that no recovery can be had upon any duty imposed by force of the contract, and that the recovery, if had, must be based upon a duty imposed by law under the circumstances, without reference to the contract. It is therefore unnecessary to refer in detail to the numerous cases cited by the defendants in support of the propositions that the rule that no one can sue upon a contract unless he is a party to it cannot be evaded by bringing what is really an action for a breach of contract in the form of an action for a tort, and that "for an injury arising from mere negligence, however gross, there must exist between the party inflicting the injury and the one injured some privity, by contract or otherwise, by reason of which the former owes some legal duty to the latter." Buckley v. Gray, 110 Cal. 330, 342, 31 L. R. A. 862, 42 Pac. 900; Roddy v. Missouri P. R. Co. 104 Mo. 234, 12 L. R. A. 746, 15 S. W. 1112; National 60 L. R. A.

Sav. Bank v. Ward, 100 U. S. 195, 25 L. ed. 621. Without attempting to define the principle by which all these cases were or might have been decided, it may safely be said that in no case has recovery been permitted where the action, though in form for tort, was in substance merely for a breach of the warranty in the contract of the defendant with a third person. Murch v. Concord R. Corp. 29 N. H. 9, 34, 61 Am. Dec. 631; Patterson v. Colebrook, 29 N. H. 94, 102. The action has been deemed maintainable only when the act complained of could be seen to be the breach of a legal duty owed from the defendant to the person injured, without any reference to the warranties of the contract. The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot recover upon the ground that the defendants failed to do as they agreed with the Drake & Sanborn Company.

Although the contract is evidence tending to prove that the defendants were managing the boilers, upon the question of their negligence toward the plaintiffs—their breach of any duty owed by them to the plaintiffs—the engagements which they entered into with the Drake & Sanborn Company are entirely immaterial. Styles v. F. R. Long Co. 67 N. J. L. 413, 51 Atl. 710. Whether the maker of a machine which he sells to another is liable to a third person for injuries arising from defects in its construction is a question raised in numerous cases. The weight of authority is against any such liability, except "where the thing causing the injury is of a noxious or dangerous kind," or "where the defendant has been found guilty of fraud or deceit in passing off the thing." McCaffrey v. Mossberg & G. Mfg. Co. (R. I.) 55 L. R. A. 822, 50 Atl. 651. It may be that the principle of these cases would relieve the defendants from direct liability to the plaintiffs, if the ground of action arose upon their engagements to furnish steam for heating purposes to the Drake & Sanborn Company from an independent plant operated by themselves. Such facts may present a question of difficulty, but its consideration is not now necessary.

The claim presented by the declaration is not merely for furnishing an insufficient supply of steam, but it is for the negligent and unskillful management of machinery designed to protect all of the occupants of the building from the danger from which the plaintiffs suffered. It is also alleged that the exercise of ordinary care in the management of the boilers would have prevented the injury, and that the defendants were at the time in the sole and exclusive possession of the heating machinery, and were operating it. "The duty to do no wrong is a legal duty. The duty to protect against wrong is, generally speaking and excepting certain intimate relations in the nature of a trust, a moral obligation only, not recognized or enforced by law." Buch v. Amory Mfg. Co. 69 N. H. 257, 261, 44 Atl. 809, 811. The mere possession, therefore, of the means by which harm could be averted from the plaintiffs imposed upon the defendants no legal obligation to protect them. Possession merely of the boiler house and machinery did not impose upon the defendants any legal obligations to put the heating devices in operation. But the declaration goes further, and alleges that the defendants were in fact operating the machinery, and the negligence relied upon is the want of skill and care in what the defendants were assuming to do.

Assuming to operate the machinery for the purpose for which it was designed,—to protect all the occupants of the building, including the plaintiffs,—the law imposes upon the defendants, by force of such assumption, the obligation to exercise ordinary care and skill in doing what they attempted to do. Eduards v. Lamb, 69 N. H. 599, 50 L. R. A. 160, 45 Atl. 480; Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 479, 7 Am. Rep. 548; Baird v. Daly, 57 N. Y. 236, 240, 241, 15 Am. Rep. 488. This obligation arises, not from the contract, but from the action undertaken. There is a privity, not of contract, but of duty. It may be conceded that no liability would attach if the defendants, in violation of their contract, had ceased to manage the boilers. The charge is of negligent management while still in control; the duty violated is the obligation to exercise care so long as they retained control. Upon the facts stated in the declaration, the case is as if the defendants had assumed to hold closed a valve which, closed, prevented the flow of water into the plaintiffs' premises. Knowing that if the water escaped harm would result to others, the duty would rest upon them—at least, toward all for whose protection the device they assumed to operate was designed—to exercise care in what they did. They could not carelessly abandon their voluntarily assumed duty.

In the present case, upon the facts alleged, the defendants were holding back the water by supplying heat. While under no obligation, so far as the plaintiffs were concerned, to furnish heat or hold back the water, they could not suddenly cease from their self-appointed task without care as to what might happen from such action. If the pipe in the attic froze because no steam was admitted to the steam pipes upon that floor, there would be no liability, because the defendants did not assume to so protect the pipes. As tending to show that the defendants were not in fact operating the heating plant for the protection of the occupants of the building, the contract would, of course, be material. If they were operating it for the purpose of heating their own building merely, or portions of the Drake & Sanborn mill from which no harm came, they are not liable. The defendants, so far as the Drake & Sanborn Company were concerned, were the agency employed by them to operate the heating plant common to both mills. Though independent contractors, so that Drake & Sanborn were not liable for their casual acts of negligence under the rule of respondeat superior, the ground 60 L. R. A.

As a general rule, a servant or agent who has contracted to perform a duty owed by his master or employer is liable only to his employer for mere failure to perform such duties, and is not liable to third parties. Wilson v. Rich, 5 N. H. 455; Hill v. Caverly, 7 N. H. 215, 26 Am. Dec. 735; Denny v. Manhattan Co. 2 Denio, 115, 5 Denio, 639; Murray v. Usher, 117 N. Y. 542, 546, 547, 23 N. E. 564; Lane v. Cotton, 12 Mod. 473, 478; 1 Ch. Pl. 75; Story, Agency, §§ 308, 309; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 243. The principle is the same as in the cases cited as to the construction of a machine under contract with a third party. The liability cannot arise out of the engagements of the contract, but only from such duty as the law implies from the use and possession of the tools and appliances of the master. So long as the servant does nothing, his contract creates no liability to third persons, but the moment he enters upon the work the obligation of care arises. He cannot create a dangerous situation, and suddenly abandon the work without care for the danger of others. He is bound to the same obligation of care in stopping the machine as in starting it. Osborne v. Morgan, 130 Mass. 102, 39 Am. Rep. 437, 137 Mass. 1.

It is suggested that the failure of the Drake & Sanborn Company to maintain an inspection of the building by a watchman was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs cannot recover here unless the fault complained of was the proximate cause of their damage. If ordinary care on the part of the Drake & Sanborn Company, which they were bound to exercise to perform their duty to keep the water from the plaintiffs, would have detected the escape of the water and prevented the injury to the plaintiffs, their failure to exercise such care would constitute the proximate cause, not of the bursting of the pipes, but of the injury to the plaintiffs. The facts alleged of the necessity of heating to prevent injury to the plaintiffs' goods by water negative the suggestion that any negligence except that in the management of the heating plant was legal cause for the injury. If the suggestion is sustained by evidence at the trial, the question will be raised. It is sufficient now to say that the defendants are liable only for damage which was the proximate result of their unskilful management of the heating plant. They are not liable to those as to whose injury their negligence was only a remote cause, if the proximate cause of the injury was the failure of third parties to perform a positive duty owed by them to the plaintiffs.

The defendants' knowledge of the plaintiffs' situation and the character of the probable damage to their property by water may be important upon the question whether the defendants acted with ordinary care under all the circumstances as they knew or ought to have known them. If the plaintiffs consider an amendment of the declaration as suggested advisable, application for leave to make such amendment can be made to the superior court.

Exceptions overruled.

All concur.

v.

NATIONAL & PROVIDENCE WORSTED MILLS.

1. A mother who owns the property, takes care of the family, pays the bills, and who, by express direction amounting to a relinquishment of the father's right, is entitled to the earnings of their child, may maintain an action to recover for the loss and expense to which she is subjected by injuries negligently inflicted by a third person upon the child.
2. Evidence that, in repairing a belt which parted where the ends were laced together causing injury to an employee, a double row of holes was substituted for a single one, is inadmissible upon the question of the employer's negligence.
3. Evidence as to the manner of repairing a belt which parted and caused injury to an employee is not admissible to corroborate witnesses who testify as to the custom with respect to the preparation of belts.
4. In an action to recover for injuries to an employee by being struck by a parted belt, a requested instruction that, if she was not hit by the belt, negligence in its maintenance was immaterial, should be given.
5. Loss of the child's society is not an element of the damage to be awarded a parent for negligent injuries to it.

(October 13, 1902.)

PETITION by defendant for a new trial after verdict in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the loss of service of plaintiff's minor daughter, and the expenses incurred in her treatment, because of a personal injury alleged to have been inflicted upon her by defendant's negligence. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter B. Vincent, for defendant:

The plaintiff, the mother, has no right of action against the defendant for loss of services (1) because she is not bound to support the child, and (2) because, the alleged accident having occurred in the lifetime of the father, a right of action accrued to him

NOTE.—As to right of mother to bring action for tort on behalf of minor daughter, see, in this series, Williams v. Pope Mfg. Co. (La.) 50 L. R. A. 816.

Messrs. John W. Hogan and Philip S. Knauer, for plaintiff:

The parent of an infant child injured by defendant's negligence may recover the value of the services of the child while so incapacitated, and the expenses necessary to be incurred to restore the child to health, including medical attendance and nursing.

Tillinghast, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass on the case for negligence, and is brought to recover damages for the loss of service of the plaintiff's minor daughter, Sarah McGarr, and also to recover for the expenses incurred by the plaintiff for medicines, medical attendance, and nursing, occasioned by reason of personal injuries sustained by said Sarah while in the employ of the defendant corporation. Said Sarah McGarr, by her father and next friend, Owen McGarr, had previously brought suit against the defendant to recover damages for personal injuries growing out of the accident in question (see 22 R. I. 347, 47 Atl. 1092), and had obtained a substantial verdict therein; and thereafterwards the mother, Annie McGarr, brought this action to recover for the consequential damages suffered by herself on account of said injuries to her daughter, and upon trial thereof a verdict was rendered in her favor for the sum of $9,500. The case is now before us upon the defendant's petition for a new trial upon the grounds (1) that the verdict is against the law and the evidence; (2) that the presiding justice erred in admitting certain evidence against the objection of the defendant, and also erred in refusing to admit certain evidence offered by the defendant; (3) that the presiding justice also erred in his instructions to the jury; and (4) that the damages awarded by the jury were excessive and unjust. At the trial of the case all of the questions involved, including the question of the defendant's negligence, were considered as fully as if there had been no prior verdict and judgment in favor of the daughter, Sarah McGarr. The proof shows that she was employed by the defendant as a spinner, and at the time of the accident, January 6, 1899, was engaged in tending a spinning frame in No. 6 mill of the defendant company. The spinning frame was run by an overhead belt some 10 feet from, and substantially parallel with, the floor. The claim of the plaintiff is that this belt, by reason of its improper and insufficient lacing, suddenly broke, and that one end of it struck her daughter upon the side of her head, inflicting severe injuries, from which major hysteria developed, together with other physical ailments of a very serious and permanent nature. Owen McGarr, the father of Sarah and the husband of the plaintiff, died on November 5, 1900.

Defendant's counsel starts out with the broad contention that the action will not lie, on the ground that the plaintiff, as the mother of said Sarah, is not entitled to maintain it: First, because she was not bound to support her child, Sarah; and, second, because the right of action for loss of service, having become vested in the father during his lifetime, could not become divested and vest in the mother after his death. Having taken this position at the jury trial, the defendant objected to the introduction of any testimony as to damages. And as the trial court overruled this objection, subject to exception by the defendant, the first question which logically presents itself is, whether the action will lie.

1. That at the common law the father is entitled to the benefit of his minor children's labor while they live with him and are supported by him, there can be no doubt. His right to their services, like his right to their custody, rests upon the parental duty of maintenance, and is said to furnish some compensation to him for his own services rendered to the child. Schouler, Dom. Rel. 5th ed. § 252; Brown v. Smith, 19 R. I. 319, 30 L. R. A. 680, 33 Atl. 466. The mother, on the other hand, not being thus bound for the maintenance of her minor children, has no implied right, at the common law, to their services and earnings. The common-law doctrine as thus briefly stated, however, has been greatly relaxed by modern decisions in this country, if not in England; and the strong tendency of the courts in this country, as well stated by Field, C. J., in Horgan v. Pacific Mills, 158 Mass. 402, 33 N. E. 531, "is to give to a widow left with minor children, who keeps the family together and supports herself and them with the aid of their services, very much the same control over them and their earnings during their minority, and to impose on her, to the extent of her ability, much the same civil responsibility for their education and maintenance, as are given to and imposed on a father." The chief justice then stated the opinion of the court in that case to be as follows: "We are of opinion that when a minor child lives with its mother, who is a widow, and the child is supported by the mother, and works for her as one of the family, the mother is entitled to recover for the loss of services of the child, and for labor performed and expenses reasonably incurred in the care and cure of the child, so far as they are the consequences of an injury to the child negligently caused by the defendant." This statement of the law is abundantly supported by the authorities cited in the opinion, and by numerous others which might be added. See 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 387, and cases collected in notes 1 and 2; Drew v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. 26 N. Y. 49; McElmurray v. Turner, 86 Ga. 215, 12 S. E. 359; 2 Kent, Com. 205, 206; Nightingale v. Withington, 15 Mass. 274, 8 Am. Dec. 101; Natches, J. & C. R. Co. v. Cook, 63 Miss. 38; Harford County v. Hamilton, 60 Md. 340, 45 Am. Rep. 739; Kennedy v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 35 Hun, 186; Moritz v. Garnhart, 7 Watts, 302, 32 Am. Dec. 762; Furman v. Van Sise, 56 N. Y. 435, 15 Am. Rep. 441; Matthews v. Missouri P. R. Co. 26 Mo. App. 75.

2. It being well settled, then, that a widow may maintain an action for loss of services of her minor child, the next question which arises is, whether the plaintiff can maintain her action, the cause of which accrued prior to the death of her husband. The answer to this question, in so far as it relates to the plaintiff's right to recover for loss of service, etc., prior to the death of the father, depends primarily upon the relation which existed between the mother and daughter at the time of the accident as to the right of service; that is, whether the mother or the father of the girl at that time was legally entitled to her services. And as the father was presumably entitled thereto, it devolves upon the plaintiff to prove that he had in some way relinquished his right or conferred it upon her. While the right to the child's services is naturally in the father, he can doubtless surrender this right to another by contract or otherwise, in various ways, as (a) by binding the child as an apprentice (Ames v. Union R. Co. 117 Mass. 541, 19 Am. Rep. 426); (b) by allowing another person to so act that he stands in loco parentis (Whitaker v. Warren, 60 N. H. 26, 49 Am. Rep. 302). This principle is fully recognized in Morse v. Welton, 6 Conn. 547, 16 Am. Dec. 73, where it was held that the right of a parent to the services of his minor children "is bottomed on his duty to maintain, protect, and educate them. . . . But this right and this duty may be transferred to another, and may be relinquished to a child." The law doubtless is, however, that the father cannot permanently transfer his rights and duties to another, except by deed. State ex rel. Hodgdon v. Libbey, 44 N. H. 321, 82 Am. Dec. 223.

The testimony upon which the plaintiff relies to show that the services of Sarah belonged to her at the time of the accident is to the effect that the plaintiff is, and long has been, the real head of the family; that she owns the property, takes care of the family, and pays the bills; and that, by express direction from the father in his lifetime, she was entitled to, and did, receive all of the earnings of the daughter, Sarah. She employed the physician who has attended the daughter since the accident, and is personally responsible to him for his services. Dr. O'Keefe testifies that he rendered his services at the request of the mother; that the night he was called he saw the case would be prolonged, and he had a talk with the mother, and she told him she wanted him to attend her daughter, and would see him paid; and that his services have been charged to her. The testimony further shows that the father had no property, and no income except his current earnings. In view of this state of the proof, plaintiff's counsel contends that the wages of Sarah were the property of the mother, for the recovery of which she could have maintained an action. In other words, the contention is that the arrangement and understanding between the father and mother of Sarah as to her wages, taken in connection with the other facts aforesaid, amounted to a relinquishment by the father of his right to the daughter's services and earnings and an assignment thereof to the mother, and hence that the latter can recover for the loss thereof. We think this is so. It is true, the evidence fails to show the making of any formal agreement between the plaintiff and her husband as to the child's services and earnings; but, as it appears that there was an understanding between them to the effect that they belonged to the mother, and as it also appears that the mother managed the affairs of the family, owned the property, and contracted and paid the bills, we think this is sufficient to entitle her to maintain the action, not only for loss of services, etc., since the death of the father, but also prior thereto. If the case were one which simply showed the payment to the mother of the child's wages by direction of the father, we should not deem this sufficient to enable the mother to maintain an action of this sort, as it is matter of common knowledge that for prudential and other reasons this is frequently done. But where, as in the case at bar, there is other evidence which, taken in connection with this, shows a relinquishment by the father of his right to the child's services, and an assumption of his duties to the child by the mother, then she can maintain the action. In a leading New York case upon assignment of claim by husband to wife, the wife was allowed to collect, in an action for the recovery of the value of services, for work and labor done by plaintiff's husband and assignor for the defendant. In rendering its opinion, the court said: "The defendant contends that the plaintiff's title to the claim in suit is invalid because acquired by assignment directly from her husband. While a different rule might prevail if the rights of the husband's creditors were concerned, transfers of personalty made by husband to wife are sustained as valid between the parties, and choses in action are held to pass by delivery from one to the other without a written assignment." Seymour v. Fellows, 12 Jones & S. 126. This case was affirmed upon an appeal in an opinion written by Danforth, J., who said: "The appellant objects that the assignment of the cause of action, having been made directly to the plaintiff by her husband is void. The rights of creditors are not in question, and we think the court below properly overruled the objection." Seymour v. Fellows, 77 N. Y. 179. In Harper v. Luffkin, 7 Barn. & C. 387, the father was allowed to recover for the seduction of his married daughter, although her husband had not consented to his wife becoming the servant of her father. In delivering the opinion of the court, Lord Tenterden, Ch. J., in speaking of the husband, said: "He may put an end to that relation of master and servant, but, unless he interferes, it by no means follows that such a relation may not exist, especially as against third persons who are wrongdoers. It appears to me that such a relation might, and did in fact, exist in this case, and that, in the absence of any interference by the husband, it is not competent to the defendant to set up his rights as an answer to the action." In Parker v. Meek, 3 Sneed, 29, the mother was held entitled to recover for loss of services consequent upon the seduction of her daughter, who was twenty-four years of age, although the father of said daughter was living at the time of the seduction. In delivering the opinion of the court, McKinney, J., said: "Where the action is case, it is no more necessary in the case of a daughter of full age than in that of a minor that she should have been living in the family of the parent at the time of the seduction. Nor is it any more important in the one than in the other who was entitled to or enjoying her services at the time of the injury. The only inquiry of importance in either case is, On whom has the consequential injury fallen? And such person, whether father, mother, or other person standing in loco parentis, is entitled to legal redress in the present form of action. . . . The present action may be maintained by the mother, although by reason of the fact that the father was living at the time of the seduction, and the seduced was at the time a member of his family and rendering service to him, the mother was not then, nor could she be, in law, entitled to the services of the daughter. But, the latter having remained with the mother, after the father's death, in the presumed relation of servant, and the trouble and expenses of lying in having fallen upon her, the action is maintainable upon this ground." In Sargent v. —, 5 Cow. 106, the mother, who was a widow, bound her minor daughter by indenture as a servant until she should be eighteen years of age. During that period the daughter was seduced, and the indenture canceled. Thereupon the daughter returned to her mother, who then sued for seduction in an action on the case. The court held that upon the daughter's return the relation of master and servant was restored, and that it was not material who was entitled to the services at the time of the seduction, but "the real inquiry is, Upon whom has the consequential injury fallen,—the expense attending her confinement and the loss of her services?” In neither of these cases was there any claim that the mother had actually acquired the right to the service of the child at the time of the injury, as is shown in the case at bar. Indeed, the right of recovery in those cases seems to be based upon a consequential injury independent of any such considerations. The last-named case was followed in Ingersoll v. Jones, 5 Barb. 661; Bracy v. Kibbe, 31 Barb. 273; Gray v. Durland, 50 Barb. 100; Furman v. Van Sise, 56 N. Y. 435, 15 Am. Rep. 441.

An examination of the numerous cases bearing upon the general question involved shows that the consensus of opinion is to the effect that, in cases of wrongful injury, whoever, by reason of right or relationship, suffers consequential damage thereby, and may be liable for necessary expenses consequent upon such injury, is entitled to recover against the wrongdoer the amount of such damages and necessary expenses. The right of recovery is based, both upon the right to service, and upon the liability to support and maintain the person injured, where the result of the injury may be to render the person injured a public charge. The right to such recovery, in so far as it is based upon the liability to support the person injured, rests upon the pauper statutes, so called, beginning with the 43d Elizabeth, which is as follows (chap. 2, § 7): “And be it further enacted that the father and grandfather, and the mother and grandmother, and the children of every poor, old, blind, lame, and impotent person, or other person not able to work, being of sufficient ability, shall, at their own charges, relieve and maintain every such poor person in that manner and according to that rate as by the justices of the peace of that county, where such sufficient persons dwell, or the greater number of them, at their general quarter sessions shall be assessed, upon pain that every one of them shall forfeit 20 shillings for every month which they shall fail therein.” Our own pauper statute (Gen. Laws, chap. 79, § 5) is a practical re-enactment thereof, and is as follows: “Sec. 5. The kindred of any such poor person, if any he shall have, in the line or degree of father or grandfather, mother or grandmother, children or grandchildren, by consanguinity, or children by adoption, living within this state and of sufficient ability shall be holden to support such pauper in proportion to such ability.” A number of courts have upheld the right of one standing in loco parentis to a child to recover for loss of services of such child, resting such right upon the liability of such person for the maintenance of the child under statutes similar to 43 Elizabeth. Thus in Moritz v. Garnhart, 7 Watts, 302, 32 Am. Dec. 762, the court said of a grandparent (and in that case it is pertinent to note that both the mother and putative father of the child were alive): “He is, indeed, not a parent, but is chargeable by the poor laws with the duty of one. 60 L. R. A.

The rights of a parent are pupillary, and, as they are given for the benefit of the child, the person in the exercise of them must necessarily have a correlative remedy for their infraction.” In Mattheusson v. Perry, 37 Conn. 435, 9 Am. Rep. 339, the court said: “Our statute concerning the support of paupers by relatives imposes the obligation to provide for children alike on father and mother, making each liable if of sufficient ability. Gen. Stat. title 50, § 40. The provisions of this statute are taken substantially from 43 Eliz. If the right to receive the earnings of minor children, which is conceded to the father, be made to rest on the liability of the father for their support, the mother, having the same liability, should be entitled to the same right.” See also Hammond v. Corbett, 50 N. H. 501, 9 Am. Rep. 288; Whitaker v. Warren, 60 N. H. 26, 49 Am. Rep. 302; Union P. R. Co. v. Jones, 21 Colo. 347, 40 Pac. 891.

The uncontradicted evidence in the case at bar shows that the plaintiff has supported, cared for, and nursed her said daughter, Sarah, since the happening of the accident in question, and also that she has lost the benefit of her services during all of said time. And we are of the opinion, and therefore decide, that, upon the facts and law as above stated, the rulings of the trial court, whereby the plaintiff was permitted to introduce evidence of loss of services, etc., from the date of the accident, were correct, and should be sustained. The exceptions to such rulings are therefore overruled.

3. Amongst the testimony which the plaintiff was permitted to introduce, subject to defendant's exception, bearing upon the question of the defendant's negligence in causing the accident, was the following, viz. She was permitted to prove the manner in which the belt which broke and struck the daughter was subsequently repaired. The witness, Joseph Higginbottom, after having testified that at the time when the belt broke there was only one row of holes for the lacing in each end where it parted, was asked the following question:

Q. What did Mr. Smith do with the belt when he fixed it?

A. He punched holes over again on each end of the belt.

Q. When he punched them over again, how many rows of holes were there on each side?

A. Two rows.

Counsel for defendant objected to this, as it took place after the accident, saying: “They may have put on a new belt and done a great many things suggested by this accident, but you cannot put in testimony as to what occurred afterwards. The question is whether this belt at the time was proper. That is all. Sometimes an accident may happen, and that may suggest for the first time that something else might be done.” After considerable discussion by counsel upon both sides, the court ruled that the testimony was admissible. Last question read to witness, as follows:

Q. When he punched them over again, how many rows of holes were there on each side?

A. Two rows of holes on each side.

Q. On each side of what?

A. Of the belt.

While there has been some difference of opinion in the courts of the several states upon the question whether it is competent for a plaintiff in an action of this sort to prove that changes were made after an accident, looking to the improvement and safety of the appliance or structure causing the injury, it is now the "well-settled rule of law," as said by Rogers, J., in delivering the opinion of this court in the recent case of Morancy v. Hennessey, 24 R. I., at page 209, 52 Atl. 1021, "that evidence of precautions against further accidents, taken after an accident, is not competent to show antecedent negligence." In Morse v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 30 Minn. 465, 16 N. W. 358, the question here involved was fully considered, and, notwithstanding several previous decisions of the court to the contrary, it squarely and strongly took the ground that such evidence was not only inadmissible, but that its admission was sufficient ground for a new trial. The court said: "But on mature reflection we have concluded that evidence of this kind ought not to be admitted under any circumstances, and that the rule heretofore adopted by this court is, on principle, wrong; not for the reason given by some courts, that the acts of the employees in making such repairs are not admissible against their principals, but upon the broader ground that such acts afford no legitimate basis for construing such an act as an admission of previous neglect of duty. A person may have exercised all the care which the law required, and yet, in the light of his new experience, after an unexpected accident has occurred, and as a measure of extreme caution, he may adopt additional safeguards. The more careful a person is, the more regard he has for the lives of others, the more likely he would be to do so, and it would seem unjust that he could not do so without being liable to have such acts construed as an admission of prior negligence. We think such a rule puts an unfair interpretation upon human conduct, and virtually holds out an inducement for continued negligence." In Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 N. Y. 151, 15 N. E. 309, Earl, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language, which is very pertinent to the case at bar: "After an accident has happened, it is ordinarily easy to see how it could have been avoided; and then, for the first time, it frequently happens that the owner receives his first intimation of the defective or dangerous condition of the machine or structure which caused or led to the accident. Such evidence has no tendency whatever, we think, to show that the machine or structure was not previously in a 60 L. R. A.

reasonably safe and perfect condition, or that the defendant ought, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to have made it more perfect, safe, and secure. While such evidence has no legitimate bearing upon the defendant's negligence or knowledge, its natural tendency is undoubtedly to prejudice and influence the minds of the jury. Hence, in this court, and generally in the supreme court, it has been held erroneous to receive such evidence." The recent Pennsylvania case of Baron v. Reading Iron Co. 202 Pa. 274, 51 Atl. 979, discusses the question very fully, and arrives at the same conclusion; stating in summing up that "to the same effect are the decisions of nearly every state in which the subject has been considered." And this statement is well fortified by the numerous cases cited. See also Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 N. Y. 151, 15 N. E. 309, reversing judgment for plaintiff; Getty v. Hamlin, 127 N. Y. 636, 27 N. E. 309, reversing judgment for plaintiff; Payne v. Troy & B. R. Co. 9 Hun, 526; Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co. 51 Conn. 524, 50 Am. Rep. 47; Ely v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 77 Mo. 34; Hudson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 581, 44 Am. Rep. 692, 13 N. W. 735; Hawitt v. Taunton Street R. Co. 167 Mass. 483, 46 N. E. 106. See also cases collected in "Negligence Rules, Decisions, and Opinions," by Edward B. Thomas, title Subsequent Acts and Statements, pp. 583-593.

Of course, the main purpose of the evidence introduced as to the change in the manner of lacing the belt in question after the accident was to show a recognition by the defendant of its negligence in not having properly laced it before the accident. And that such evidence might very naturally have been so taken and construed by the jury, there can be no doubt. Its admission, therefore, was reversible error. Graham v. Coupe, 9 R. I. 478; Tourgee v. Rose, 19 R. I. 432, 37 Atl. 9; Kolb v. Union R. Co. 23 R. I. 72, 49 Atl. 392; Corcoran v. Peekskill, 108 N. Y. 151, 15 N. E. 309.

But plaintiff's counsel argues in his brief that the testimony in question "was proper as showing the condition of the joint at the time it broke, and explaining why it broke, and as corroborating the testimony of the witnesses Higginbottom and Sarah McGarr to the effect that this 'section hand' who had charge of these belts was accustomed to make joints and lace them with only one row of holes punched upon either side." Doubtless it did show, or strongly tend to show, why, in the judgment of the defendant's servant who repaired it, it was defectively fastened together; but, as already suggested, this knowledge might have been, and probably was, gained by reason of the accident, and, hence, cannot properly be attributed to the defendant before the accident happened. Its showing the condition of the belt at the time it broke, and explaining why it broke, as argued, is not apparent; for at the time it broke it was, according to the testimony produced by the plaintiff, in a different condition, namely, there was but one row of holes in each end of the belt where it was laced, whereas afterwards a second row of holes was punched in each end thereof, and two rows of lacing inserted. As to the testimony being proper as corroborating the testimony of the witnesses Higginbottom and Sarah McGarr, as argued, it is sufficient to reply that we know of no rule of evidence which permits a witness to be corroborated in this manner.

Plaintiff's counsel further argues that "at all events, in view of the other testimony in the case, the admission of this testimony was harmless to the defendant, and so is no ground for a new trial." As already intimated, we cannot agree to this contention. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that it was very prejudicial to the defendant, and that its admission was such error as compels the granting of a new trial. The exception to the admission of the testimony now under consideration is therefore sustained.

A number of other exceptions were taken by the defendant to the admission and rejection of testimony during the trial, but an examination thereof fails to satisfy us that any of them are tenable, or that they are of sufficient importance to require special consideration.

4. There is an exception to the refusal of a request by the defendant to charge the jury, however, which we think should be sustained. We refer to the fourth request, which was as follows: "(4) If the belt broke and passed over the girl's head without hitting her, the matter of lacing and inspection is not material." This request should have been granted. The only claim which the plaintiff alleges and declares upon, and the only one which the evidence tends to sustain, and hence, of course, the only one upon which she can recover, is that the belt broke and struck the girl, and thereby caused the injury complained of. It therefore necessarily follows that, if she was not hit by the belt, the action cannot be maintained. This exception is therefore sustained.

5. There is also an exception by the defendant to the granting of a request made by the plaintiff to charge the jury to the effect that damages might be awarded for loss of the society of the child, caused by the accident. The court instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff lost the society of the child "through the wrongful act of another, she would be entitled to recover for that." This was error. In an action of this sort, the proper measure of damages is the pecuniary value of the child's services from the time of the injury until it attains its majority, less its support and maintenance, together with the necessary costs and expenses incident to the care and cure of the child,—such as those for medical and surgical attendance. 2 Sedgw. Damages, 7th ed. p. 520, note "b," and cases cited. But the jury are not at liberty to consider the fact that the plaintiff has been deprived of the comfort and society of the child, nor can they consider any physical or mental suffering or pain which may have been sustained by the parent by reason of the injury to the child. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Rush, 127 Ind. 545, 26 N. E. 1010; Oakland R. Co. v. Fielding, 48 Pa. 320; Cowden v. Wright, 24 Wend. 429, 35 Am. Dec. 633. In short, the measure of damages in such a case is the same as that which obtains in a case brought by a master for the loss of services of his servant or apprentice. It is therefore practically a business and commercial question only, and the elements of affection and sentiment have no place therein. Moreover, in the case at bar the plaintiff does not allege in her declaration that any damages were sustained by reason of the loss of the society of her daughter, but only that she sustained damages by reason of having been deprived "of the earnings and income and services of her minor daughter and servant," and in nursing and caring for her, as aforesaid. In actions for the seduction of a daughter and for the alienation of the affections of a wife, a different rule doubtless prevails, and damages may be recovered for the disgrace and humiliation brought upon the parent in the former class of cases, in addition to those sustained by loss of service,—Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 271; 2 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 579; 3 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. § 1283,—and for loss of the society and affection of the wife in the latter class. The defendant's exception to that part of the charge referred to is therefore sustained.

As we have come to the conclusion that a new trial must be granted, there is no occasion for us to consider the other grounds upon which the defendant's petition is based, namely, that the verdict is against the evidence, and that the damages awarded are excessive.

The verdict is set aside, and a new trial granted. Case remitted to the Common Pleas Division for further proceedings.

Phebe A. CARR.

1. A third extension of time to file statement of evidence on a motion for new trial will be presumed to be within the time of a former extension, where it was duly allowed by the trial judge, and the statute requires extensions to be within the time of former ones, although the second one is not on file.
2. A statement of evidence on petition for new trial may be filed on the day "to" which the time for filing has been extended, since the extension includes the day to which it is granted.
3. A requested instruction that the petition sets out no cause of action

NOTE.—For services of attorney in defending or prosecuting suit for infant as necessities, see also, in this series, Askey v. Williams (Tex.) 5 L. R. A. 176, and cases in note thereto; also cases in note to Kilgore v. Rich (Me.) 12 L. R. A. on page 860.

against an infant under age is properly refused, where defendant was described as an infant, her guardian served with process, and the cause of action alleged to be for necessities furnished.

4. A promise by an infant to pay for necessities consisting of services of an attorney in conducting a lawsuit will be implied, where the suit was brought by her next friend, was legally proper, and the infant conferred with the attorney, appeared as a witness, and profited by the successful prosecution of the suit.
5. Services of an attorney in prosecuting for an infant an action to recover damages for an indecent assault on her are necessities.
6. A father is not bound to supply his infant daughter with counsel fees to prosecute an action for damages for an indecent assault on her.
7. Submission to the jury of the question whether or not services rendered to an infant were necessities is not available as error to defendant, who is sought to be held liable therefor, where the jury found them to be necessities, and the court would have been compelled to make the same ruling had it undertaken to decide the question.

Ames v. Potter, 7 R. I. 265.

Plaintiff was employed by George H. Sprague as agent of his daughter. Acceptance of the services and the benefit of the trial render the daughter liable.

Ibid.

Rogers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is defendant's petition for a new trial, after verdict for the plaintiff, of an 60 L. R. A.

action of assumpsit for counsel fees for services alleged to have been rendered to the defendant, who is a minor, in bringing and successfully prosecuting an action at law brought by the defendant, by her father and next friend, George H. Sprague, against one Joseph H. Brown, for an alleged indecent assault upon her.

1. After the petition for a new trial was filed, the plaintiff moved to dismiss it for the following reasons: The defendant, upon the rendition of the verdict against her, duly filed notice of her intention to claim a new trial, and asked for an extension of time to file statement of evidence, etc., which was granted, and time was extended to October 15, 1901. On October 31st the time was further extended to November 8th, on which last-named date the statement was filed, and has been allowed by the justice presiding at the jury trial. The plaintiff claims that, inasmuch as there is no written extension of time from October 15th to October 31st on file, the petition should be dismissed, as the last extension was not made "within any extension thereof," etc., as required by R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 251, § 6, p. 864. The statute provides that within five days after verdict, or within any extension thereof from time to time on motion therefor, the justice may extend the time for filing statements to such time as he may prescribe. With such discretion in the justice, it is to be presumed that his action was regular, and that the extension from October 15th to October 31st has been lost. That a clerical error was committed by the defendant's attorney in dates is apparent, for he heads his original motion for time extension thus, "Adjourned June Session, A. D. 1891," instead of 1901, and asks that the time be extended to October 15, 1891, instead of 1901; the name of the county and the name of parties and the name of court being correctly given. The justice, in extending the time, gives the date of his action as July 10, 1901,—the very date of the rendition of the verdict,—and extends the time to October 15, 1901, so the clerical error is of no practical account.

2. The plaintiff also claims that filing the statement on November 8, 1901, is not a compliance with the extension to November 8, 1901. The invariable practice since the enactment of the judiciary act in 1893 by successive judges has been to construe the extension as inclusive of the day to which the extension was granted, and to allow statements so filed when correct; and the presiding justice has allowed the statement in this case. The construction so adopted and followed has become too securely established, in our opinion, to be now successfully attacked. For the reasons given, the plaintiff's motion to dismiss the petition for a new trial is overruled. The defendant petitions for a new trial on the ground that the trial justice erred in his rulings upon questions of law raised at the trial, and that said justice declined to rule and charge the jury as requested by the petitioner, and ruled against her requests. The defendant's requests which the justice refused to give, and to which refusal the defendant excepted, are as follows, viz.: "(1) The declaration sets out no cause of action against the defendant, an infant under the age of twenty-one years. (2) The testimony discloses no cause of action against the infant defendant; the services rendered not being necessities as a matter of law, and the defendant never having ratified the claim after arriving at her majority. (3) If the defendant was an infant under the age of twenty-one years, the father could not bind her estate by any contract with the plaintiff for professional services." We think the first request was properly denied. In the second judicial district court, where the action was originally brought, the defendant was described as an infant, and her guardian was duly served with process as required by statute. The defendant demurred because the declaration did not set out that the services rendered by the plaintiff as an attorney were necessities. The case was tried, both on its merits on the general issue, and on the demurrer, evidence being put in as to necessities; and, while the district court was holding it for advisement, the plaintiff filed an amended declaration with the averment inserted, for the lack of which the defendant had demurred. Subsequently the district judge rendered a long decision in favor of the plaintiff, deciding that the services were necessities. Thereupon the defendant asked for a jury trial, and the case was certified to the common pleas division, where the defendant again demurred for the same reason as before, with the added ground that the declaration did not set out that the defendant had ratified the contract since attaining majority. The demurrer was overruled, and the case was tried to the jury on the questions whether the defendant had made a promise, and whether the services rendered were necessities that the defendant, under the circumstances of the case, was liable for; there being no pretense on the plaintiff's part that the defendant had ratified any promise made by her after attaining her majority. We think the declaration set out a cause of action against the defendant, an infant under twenty-one years, and the trial showed that the defendant's counsel fully understood and appreciated the cause set forth.

3. The next question raised is whether the plaintiff's services were necessities. The services rendered by the plaintiff were as follows: The defendant in the summer of 1898 was seventeen years old and unmarried. In August of that year her father, George H. Sprague, went to the plaintiff's office in Westerly, and told him of an indecent assault upon her by one Joseph H. Brown, and wanted a suit brought in order to protect her and others from similar assaults. The result of the consultation was that the plaintiff brought action against said Brown in the name of the defendant, by her father as her next friend, and after trial thereof the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the infant (being the defendant in the case at bar) for $600, which verdict was sustained on a petition for a new trial, and 60 L. R. A.

judgment was entered on the verdict in June, 1899. Mr. Allen, who is counsel for the defendant in the case at bar, was counsel for the said Brown in the damage suit against him. When the plaintiff in the case at bar visited the clerk's office of the common pleas division with reference to getting out an execution in the damage suit against Brown, he found a paper filed June 13, 1899, signed by said Brown and by Phebe A. Carr (for Miss Sprague had been married then), to the effect that the case had been settled: but said paper was not signed by her father, George H. Sprague, her next friend, nor had any guardian then been appointed. Notwithstanding this peculiar settlement, execution was ordered to issue. The plaintiff in the case at bar, as shown by the statement of evidence, swore as follows, viz.: "I went to see her [the present defendant], and she was sick. I asked her if she had made that settlement, and she didn't answer at first, but finally admitted that on June 13th she was sent for by Mr. Allen to come to a neighbor's there, and she went without the knowledge of her father or mother, and they settled it up, taking a $400 note. At this time she told me she didn't want to settle it, and wanted me to look out for her." The full judgment, amounting to $663, was finally collected, but not without efforts made in court by said Brown to enforce the settlement. After the execution was collected, the amount was paid to the defendant's guardian, who had then been appointed. It is urged for the defendant that the plaintiff's claim for services is properly one against George H. Sprague, and not against her. The situation was this; a girl of seventeen, having no estate and no guardian, was the victim of an indecent assault. She had a father and mother, and her father, her natural guardian, so to speak, at once took steps for his daughter's protection and for compensation for her sufferings, and incidentally for the punishment of her assailant. Her father was naturally her next friend, and legally became such to enable a suit to be brought, as she, being a minor, could not, except under very extraordinary circumstances, bring it without the aid of a next friend to manage it, which the law presumes, from the disability of her infancy, she is unable properly to manage herself; the next friend being liable to the defendant for costs of suit in case the infant fails in the action. Bliven v. Wheeler, 23 R. I. 379, 50 Atl. 644. If the infant recovers, her estate would be enriched, and, as she would then have an estate, she would then require a guardian, to whom the amount recovered would be paid. If the suit against Brown was a legally proper one for the next friend to have aided the infant to bring, and the expense of counsel engaged therein was what is technically termed in law "necessaries," then the infant defendant would be liable for such necessities. It has been urged that the infant, in propria persona, did not promise the plaintiff in the case at bar to pay him for services, nor did she actually engage him. The father's duty as next friend was to exercise his mature judgment in the management of the action which the immature judgment of the infant, the law presumed, was not equal to; and the very first occasion for the exercise of such judgment was in the employment of capable counsel. The daughter knew of the bringing of the suit, and profited by its successful prosecution. She must have conferred with counsel and appeared as a witness, and she certainly attempted to settle such action in a manner highly injurious to her own interests. An implied promise for necessities is sufficient (Gay v. Ballou, 4 Wend. 403, 21 Am. Dec. 168), and in the case at bar the circumstances, we think, are sufficient to imply a promise on the part of the infant defendant.

4. The next question to be considered is, Was the service rendered by the plaintiff, as an attorney at law, legal necessities for the minor? In 5 Bacon, Abr. Bouvier's ed. 116, it is stated that where infants "contract for necessities they are absolutely bound; and this, likewise, is in benignity to infants, for, if they were not allowed to bind themselves for necessities, no person would trust them, in which case they would be in worse circumstances than persons of full age. Therefore, it is clearly agreed by all the books that speak of this matter that an infant may bind himself to pay for his necessary meat, drink, apparel, physic, and such other necessities, and likewise for his good teaching and instruction, whereby he may profit himself afterwards." Bouvier, in his Law Dictionary (vol. 2, p. 476), says: "The term 'necessaries' is not confined merely to what is requisite barely to support life, but includes many of the conveniences of refined society. It is a relative term, which must be applied to the circumstances and conditions of the parties." Dicey, in his work on Parties to Actions (p. 285), says: "The word 'necessaries,' as applied to an infant, extends beyond the sense which is given it in ordinary conversation. It not only includes such articles as are necessary to the support of life, but extends to articles fit to maintain the particular person in the station and degree of life in which he is placed. The term 'necessaries' is, in other words, purely relative to the infant's position in life. . . . From the relative character of the term, combined with the tendency of juries to find an infant, if it be possible, liable on contracts of which he has received the benefit, has arisen a considerable variety in the decisions on the question as to what things are, and what are not, necessities." As said by the supreme court of Nebraska in Englebert v. Trowell, 40 Neb. 195, 204, sub nom. Englebert v. Pritchett, 26 L. R. A. 177, 58 N. W. 852. "As to what are necessities for an infant cannot be defined by any general rule applicable to all cases. It is a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined in each case from the particular facts, circumstances, and surroundings in that case."

liable to an attorney for services rendered, though these are in most part for services rendered as to the infant's property. Then there are cases where infants have been held liable for counsel fees as necessities, even when the services related to the infant's property, if beneficial to the infant's estate. Epperson v. Nugent, 57 Miss. 45, 34 Am. Rep. 434; Searcy v. Hunter, 81 Tex. 644, 17 S. W. 372; Thrall v. Wright, 38 Vt. 491. There is a class of cases allowing counsel fees as necessities for an infant, where the cases in which the services were rendered affected the infant's personal relief, protection, or liberty, which, it seems to us, more closely analogize the case at bar than those relating merely to property rights. Munson v. Washband, 31 Conn. 303, 83 Am. Dec. 151, was a case where a female infant was seduced and got with child under a promise of marriage. The seducer afterwards refused to marry her, and she was left in a state of destitution and suffering, her father having turned her out of doors. Thereupon she applied to an attorney to bring suit for her for the breach of the promise of marriage. He did so, and it was afterwards settled by the marriage of the parties. After the marriage the attorney sued the husband and wife for his services. The decision was that if the services were necessary for the personal relief, protection, and support of the female defendant, the action might be maintained; and the court refused to disturb the jury's verdict for the plaintiff. The court, through Hinman, Ch. J. (p. 307, 31 Conn., 83 Am. Dec. 151), says: "The law, being founded in reason, admits of exceptions. Now, one of the principal reasons why an infant is not allowed to make contracts is to protect him from improvident bargains resulting from his inexperience, and the same reason causes the exception, where he is allowed to contract for necessities, since it can never be for his benefit to be unable to contract for food, shelter, etc., if he has no funds or other means of being provided for; and, situated as this infant was, abandoned by her natural protector, and having become an outcast, but still having valid claims, which, if enforced, would rescue her from this condition, it appears to us that it was obviously for her benefit that she should be enabled to employ counsel to enforce them. It was not the case of merely prosecuting an infant's right to property, or for the recovery of an ordinary debt. In such cases there is, or ought to be, a guardian to protect the infant's rights. There was none here, and it does not appear that there were any practicable means of procuring one to be appointed. No one would incur liabilities on her account unless he could rely upon her agreement to indemnify him out of the damages she might recover in the suits to be commenced. It appears to us, therefore, that, while the court recognized the rule that the ordinary fees of an attorney for the prosecution of an infant's rights to property could not generally be said to be necessities, it yet further correctly informed them, in substance, that such services, where requisite for the personal relief, protection, and support of the infant, might lawfully be contracted for by the infant, and that he would be bound in law to pay for them. It appears to us that this is a very reasonable rule, which will operate for the benefit of minors, and therefore comes within the principle on which they are allowed in certain cases to make contracts, and in others are not authorized to do so. We think there may be cases (and the jury have found this to be one of them) where a civil suit may, under extraordinary circumstances, be the only means by which an infant can procure the absolute necessities which he requires; and, where such is the case, it would be a reproach to the law to deny him the power of making the necessary contracts for its commencement and prosecution." In Barker v. Hibbard, 54 N. H. 539, 20 Am. Rep. 160, the plaintiff sued an emancipated infant for services rendered him as attorney in defending him in a bastardy proceeding. The court said, inter alia: "We think it must be held that an infant is liable for the services of his attorney in defending him against a bastardy proceeding. This may, it is true, sometimes subject him to larger liabilities than he would incur by making no defense, and procuring his liberty by applying for a discharge from imprisonment after he had been found chargeable; but it is to be presumed that he is innocent until he is proved to be guilty. A bastardy proceeding, though held to be a civil action, can only be sustained upon the ground that the defendant has committed a criminal offense. His good name is at stake, as well as his property, if he has any or ever acquires any,—for a judgment rendered against him will be valid, whether he is or is not liable to pay his attorney; and, besides, if he is found chargeable, the court may not release him upon satisfactory evidence of his inability to comply with the order. If an infant has property, the law provides for the appointment of a guardian to hold and manage it. If he has property and is without a guardian, it is very easy to procure one to be appointed. There can rarely be occasion for an infant to employ an attorney in suits relating to his property, but, if he has no property, the law does not contemplate that he shall have a guardian; and, if one should be appointed in such a case, it would be unreasonable to expect him to employ at his own expense an attorney for his ward. If an infant has no authority to pledge his credit to an attorney when arraigned as the putative father of a bastard child, he may sometimes be prevented from getting bail or from making a successful defense. We are of the opinion that the consequences of holding that he has such authority are much more likely to be beneficial than prejudicial to his interests. He will only be liable for services and expenses which it was reasonable to render and incur. That his own directions were followed, unless there was reasonable cause to believe it was for his interest to follow them, will be immaterial. Any express promise he may make to pay exorbitant fees to his attorney will be void. He will only be liable upon an implied promise to pay a reasonable sum. . . . Charges incurred in making, or attempting to make, a defense which there was no good reason to believe it was for the interest of the infant to make, will not be recoverable." In Askey v. Williams, 74 Tex. 294, 5 L. R. A. 176, 11 S. W. 1101, the question was as to the liability of an infant to an attorney for services rendered the infant, at his request, in defending him when indicted for stealing cattle. The court said: "The contracts of an infant for necessities are neither void nor voidable, and we are of opinion that the services of an attorney should be held necessary to an infant when he is charged by an indictment with crime. His life or his liberty and reputation are at stake, and it would be unreasonable to deny him the power to secure the means of defending himself. He may contract for food and raiment suitable to his condition in life, though they be such as are not demanded by his absolute wants, and it is not to be questioned that the immunity from punishment and disgrace is a matter of far more importance to his welfare. It has accordingly been held that reasonable attorney fees in defense of a criminal action brought against an infant are necessities." Following the analogy of the last three cases cited, which commend themselves to us, we think that in the case at bar the action of the defendant against her assailant, Brown, was brought for her protection, even if the result of it, after paying the plaintiff's counsel fees, will increase her estate. We are of the opinion that the counsel fees sued for in this case were legal necessities.

The third request of the defendant, which the presiding justice denied, viz., "If the defendant was an infant under the age of twenty-one years, the father could not bind her estate by any contract with the plaintiff for professional services,"—might be correct as an abstract proposition of law, disconnected from the circumstances of this case; but, with its connections, we think it was properly denied. The father's employment of the plaintiff as counsel in the action against Brown was simply for his infant daughter while he was acting as her prochein ami, and, in connection with the conduct of his daughter, was not the father's promise, but the implied promise of the infant daughter.

We find no errors in the rulings of the presiding justice at the jury trial of which the defendant can complain, for the defendant's fourth request to charge was granted; and that, in our opinion, without further explanation, was too favorable to the defendant. That request was as follows: "Nothing to the contrary appearing, it is presumed that the father provided the defendant with all necessities, and she must bind herself for necessities." It is a general rule that a father, at least of sufficient ability (Pearce v. Olney, 5 R. I. 269), is bound to supply an unemancipated infant with food, raiment, etc. (th: ordinary necessities), yet he is not bound, in our opinion, to supply counsel fees out of his own purse for the infant in a case like that against Brown; and the evidence showed that the plaintiff trusted the infant, and not the father. The principle upon which the father of an infant is obliged to provide the ordinary necessities is that he is entitled to the infant's wages until he voluntarily emancipates her during her infancy, or the law emancipates her upon attaining her majority. The action against Brown was brought by the infant for the suffering he inflicted upon her, and for her protection against him in the future. It was not brought by the father for the loss of the infant's services, and it could not have been brought by him for her suffering; hence, the amount recovered went, not to him, but to the infant, and has been paid to the infant's guardian. It seems to us clear, from analogy, that, just as an emancipated infant can bind herself for necessities of all kinds when, released from her father's claim upon her for the consideration, she is liable to him for the necessities furnished by him, so she can bind herself for necessities such as the one under consideration, for which, the father not being bound to provide for her, he technically gets no benefit from. It certainly does not seem just that a father, of slender means, perhaps, should be obliged to pay counsel for services which technically he gets no pecuniary benefit from, and the infant's estate gets all the pecuniary benefit of. In Munson v. Washband, 31 Conn. 303, 83 Am. Dec. 151, the infant's father turned her out of doors, while in this case the infant's father lent all the aid in his power; but in the former case the court required the counsel's services to be paid, and we see no reason why in this case counsel is not equally entitled to pay for his services. Whether, however, the fourth charge was too favorable for the defendant, or not, is of no consequence, as it did not injure the defendant.

The defendant's conditional exception, contained in her counsel's words, "If your honor has charged that the jury is to decide whether these services were necessary or not, then I wish to take an exception," if formally correct and allowed, can avail the defendant nothing. There are authorities both ways, etc., that the question of necessities is for the court, and also that it is a question for the jury. Inasmuch as the jury have found that the plaintiff's services were necessities, if it was a question for them, and inasmuch as, if it was a question for the court, the court would have had to have ruled that said services were necessities in this case, the defendant has no ground to be aggrieved.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, the defendant's petition for a new trial is denied, and the case is remitted to the Common Pleas Division, with direction to enter judgment upon the verdict.

Angelo PAOLINO

v.

Frank McKENDALL

(.....R. I.....)

An occupier of land who undertakes to burn rubbish thereon is under no obligation to guard children of tender years who are in the habit of resorting there to play, from injury by approaching the fire.

(October 6, 1902.)

ON DEMURRER to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's minor child, which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Carroll, for defendant, in support of demurrer:

The defendant, as owner or lawful occupant of the premises, had the right to use them to burn thereon waste materials.

The temptation to the child to approach the fire does not constitute an invitation, on the part of the owner or occupant, for her to come upon the premises.

To make the defendant liable in an action of this kind, it is necessary to allege and prove that the acts done by the defendant were wilfully injurious, or that the injury was due to the reckless or careless conduct of the defendant, or that the danger was concealed.

Mr. D. J. Holland for plaintiff, contra.

Rogers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a demurrer to both counts of the plaintiff's declaration in an action of trespass on the case for negligence. The first count is as follows: "For that the said defendant on, to wit, the 8th day of July, A. D. 1901, by his agents and servants, was engaged in erecting a building on Swiss street, near Knight street, public highways in the city of Providence; that near to and adjoining the lot upon which said building was erected was a vacant lot, which for a long time theretofore had been used by the occupiers of the premises in the vicinity and neighborhood thereof as a common resort for pleasure of said occupiers, and as a playground for their children, and in which the plaintiff's intestate, a child of one of said occupiers, and other children, the children of said occupiers, with the knowledge and consent and by the invitation of the owner of said premises, were accustomed to play, to the knowledge of said defendant; and that on, to wit, the 8th day of July, A. D. 1901, the said defendant, by his agents and servants, lighted a large fire upon said lot for the purpose of burning waste materials used in the building of said house. And the plaintiff avers that it was the duty of the defendant to take and use reasonable and proper means and precautions to prevent accident or injury happening to the plaintiff's intestate while using said parcel of land as a playground aforesaid, and to keep and maintain said fire so started by him as aforesaid properly guarded and protected against damage to the lives of children of tender years who might go, wander, or be allowed or attracted thereto by their childish instincts; yet the defendant, well knowing the premises, but not regarding his duty therein as aforesaid, neglected, failed, and refused to take and use reasonable and proper means to prevent accident or injury to the plaintiff's intestate while using said parcel of land as a playground as aforesaid, and did not keep and maintain said fire so started as aforesaid properly protected and guarded. And the plaintiff avers that on, to wit, the 8th day of July, A. D. 1901, at Providence, the plaintiff's intestate, who was then and there a child of tender years, to wit, of the age of five years, being a child of one of the occupiers of the premises in the vicinity and neighborhood of said parcel of land, while using said parcel of land as a playground aforesaid, with the knowledge and consent and by the invitation of the defendant, and while in the exercise of due care, and allured and induced by her childish instincts to approach said fire, her dress suddenly caught fire from said flame, and she was so seriously burned that in consequence thereof she died." The second count is substantially like the first, except that it is alleged that the defendant was building the house as a contractor, and it is not alleged that the plaintiff's intestate went upon the lot by reason of any invitation of the defendant or the owner of said lot. The grounds of demurrer to the first count are: (1) Because it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) because it does not set forth with sufficient certainty wherein said defendant's negligence consists; and (3) because it appears therein that the injury to the plaintiff's intestate was caused by her own negligent act in approaching said fire. The grounds of demurrer to the second count are the same as those to the first count, with two additional grounds, but the third ground to the first count constitutes the fifth ground to the second count. The third and fourth grounds of demurrer to the second count are: (3) Because there is no averment therein that plaintiff's intestate was upon said lot upon the invitation or with the knowledge or consent of said defendant, or upon the invitation or with the knowledge or consent of the owner of said lot, if said defendant was not the owner thereof, nor is there set forth in said count any fact showing such invitation, knowledge, or consent; (4) because, according to the allegations in said second count, the defendant owed no duty to the plaintiff's intestate to keep her from being injured as set forth in said count while on said premises.

In the words of the plaintiff's brief: "The plaintiff bases his case solely upon the theory that an occupier of land, having thereon dangerous agencies, to which children of tender years, too untrained and inexperienced to appreciate the dangers and resist the temptations placed before them, are likely to be allured or attracted, is under the duty of exercising the care which an ordinary person would exercise in the premises to prevent injury therefrom to such children, either by guarding or inclosing the dangerous agency, or by giving warning to parents of the existence of the danger." The words "by the invitation of," referring to the owner or occupier of the premises, in connection with the use of said lot as a common resort as a playground for the children of the neighborhood, including the plaintiff's intestate, are more than once used in the first count of the declaration, yet an express invitation is nowhere alleged, and those words are always preceded by the words "with the knowledge and consent and." With such a use of words, coupled with the theory upon which the plaintiff bases his claim, as shown in the above quotation from his brief, we understand that the only invitation to use said lot as a playground for children, intended to be alleged, was only a constructive invitation, or such, if any, as could be implied from the owner's or defendant's knowing said lot was so used without objection made, and that, as to the fire, there was no invitation to approach it, other than the fact of the fire being there, whereby the plaintiff's intestate was "allured and induced by her childish instincts to approach said fire." We are further led to this understanding by the fact that some of the cases cited on the plaintiff's brief proceed upon the doctrine of constructive invitation; that is, that if, by way of illustration, a person is allured, or, more properly, tempted, by some act of a railroad company to enter upon its land, he is not a trespasser; and it has been held that leaving a turntable unguarded is such an act. We have been thus particular in defining our understanding of the use of the word "invitation," in the first count of the declaration, because if the invitation to the plaintiff's intestate to use said vacant lot as a playground was express, or by implication making it equal in significance to an express invitation, the rule as to liability would be very different from what it would be if the invitation was only constructive, consisting of the kind of allurements or mere license we have referred to.

The basis of a cause of action for injury to a person by reason of negligence or want of due care is the breach of some duty or the nonobservance of some obligation that the defendant is under to the plaintiff. As said by the New Jersey court of errors and appeals in Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 637, 41 L. R. A. 831, 40 Atl. 682: "There cannot be such a thing as the negligent performance of a nonexistent duty." The very first step in attempting to fasten a liability upon a defendant is to show a duty he is under, either by commission or omission, to the plaintiff. Having done that, the next step is to show the breach or neglect of such duty. "There is a clear distinction," said this court in Beehler v. Daniels, 18 R. I. 563, 565, 27 L. R. A. 512, 29 Atl. 0, "between a license and an invitation to enter premises, and an equally clear distinction as to the duty of an owner in the two cases. An owner owes to a licensee no duty as to the condition of premises, unless imposed by statute, save that he should not knowingly let him run upon a hidden peril 60 L. R. A.

or wilfully cause him harm, while to one invited he is under obligation for reasonable security for the purposes of the invitation." In speaking of this class of cases, Bigelow, Ch. J., in Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co., 10 Allen, 368, 373, 87 Am. Dec. 644, after referring to keepers of inns and of shops, said: "The general rule or principle applicable to this class of cases is that an owner or occupant is bound to keep his premises in a safe and suitable condition for those who come upon and pass over them, using due care, if he has held out any invitation, allurements, or inducement, either express or implied, by which they have been led to enter thereon. A mere naked license or permission to enter or pass over an estate will not create a duty or impose an obligation on the part of the owner or person in possession to provide against the danger of accident. The gist of the liability consists in the fact that the person injured did not act merely for his own convenience and pleasure, and from motives to which no act or sign of the owner or occupant contributed, but that he entered the premises because he was led to believe that they were intended to be used by visitors or passengers, and that such use was not only acquiesced in by the owner or person in possession and control of the premises, but that it was in accordance with the intention and design with which the way or place was adapted and prepared or allowed to be so used. The true distinction is this: A mere passive acquiescence by an owner or occupier in a certain use of his land by others involves no liability; but, if he directly or by implication induces persons to enter on and pass over his premises, he thereby assumes an obligation that they are in a safe condition, suitable for such use, and for a breach of this obligation he is liable in damages to a person injured thereby." As to what such an inducement or allurements is will be considered later. "The rule is," said the supreme court of New Jersey in Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 467, 472, "that he who enjoys the permission or passive license is only relieved from the responsibility of being a trespasser, and must assume all the ordinary risk attached to the nature of the place or the business carried on."

In the case at bar the defendant is sought to be made liable upon the doctrine of a series of cases called the "Turntable Cases," consisting of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, decided in 1873, and reviewed and adhered to in Union P. R. Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 38 L. ed. 434, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 619, decided in 1894, and of other cases following it. In the Stout Case a boy six years old was injured while playing on a railroad company's land on a railroad turntable that was not attended or guarded by any servant of the company, was not fastened or locked, and revolved easily on its axis. The propositions laid down in that case by Hunt, J., delivering the opinion, are that, "while it is the general rule in regard to an adult that, to entitle him to recover damages for an injury resulting from the fault or negligence of another, he must himself have been free from fault, such is not the rule in regard to an infant of tender years. The care and caution required of a child is according to his maturity and capacity only, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case." Further, that, "while a railway company is not bound to the same degree of care in regard to mere strangers who are unlawfully upon its premises that it owes to passengers conveyed by it, it is not exempt from responsibility to such strangers for injuries arising from its negligence or from its tortious acts." The doctrine of that series of cases is thus clearly and comprehensively stated in 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 403, 404: "When a child of tender years commits a mere technical trespass, and is injured by agencies that to an adult would be open and obvious warnings of danger, but not so to a child, he is not debarred from recovering, if the things instrumental in his injury were left exposed and unguarded, and were of such a character as to be likely to attract children, excite their curiosity, and lead to their injury, while they were pursuing their childish instincts. Such dangerous and attractive instrumentalities become an invitation by implication."

The facts alleged in both counts of the declaration in the case at bar are so analogous to those in the Turntable Cases as to make the principle of law properly applicable to one also applicable to the other; and inasmuch as the rule of the so-called Turntable Cases has been adopted by many courts, thus affording ample authority, yet whether we shall follow that rule depends upon the weight of the reason on which it rests, for some of the courts which have recognized the rule have limited its operation strictly to turntables and other dangerous and attractive machinery, and it has been utterly rejected by the courts of last resort of New Hampshire in 1886, Massachusetts in 1891, New York in 1895, Texas in 1897, New Jersey in 1898, West Virginia in 1898 and again in 1901, Michigan in 1901, and Georgia in 1901. See Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 9 Atl. 790; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 154 Mass. 349, 13 L. R. A. 248, 28 N. E. 283; Walsh v. Fitchburg R. Co. 145 N. Y. 301, 27 L. R. A. 724, 39 N. E. 1068; Dobbins v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 91 Tex. 60, 38 L. R. A. 573, 41 S. W. 62; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L. R. A. 831, 40 Atl. 682; Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L. R. A. 148, 31 S. E. 993; Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L. R. A. 911, 40 S. E. 410; Ryan v. Towar, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L. R. A. 310, 87 N. W. 644; Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. v. Beavers, 113 Ga. 398, 54 L. R. A. 314, 39 S. E. 82.

R. A., and p. 996, 31 S. E.): "I am guilty of no undue assumption in condemning the Stout Case, as it has received in some courts—the most eminent in the land—open condemnation, and in others criticism tantamount to condemnation, and some which followed it limit its application to its facts, or desire to recant."

It is apparent, as stated in the New Jersey case of Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Reich, 61 N. J. L. 635, 41 L. R. A. 831, 40 Atl. 682, and in the West Virginia case of Uthermohlen v. Bogg's Run Co. 50 W. Va. 457, 55 L. R. A. 911, 40 S. E. 410, that the principle on which the doctrine of liability rests in the Turntable Cases, if sound, must be applicable more widely than to railroad companies and their turntables, and that it would require a similar rule to be applied to all owners and occupiers of land, in respect to any structure, machinery, or implement maintained by them which presents a like attractiveness and furnishes a like temptation to children.

The Stout Case was decided in October, 1873, and since then has been referred to at least twice in the court of last resort in this state. Bishop v. Union R. Co. 14 R. I. 314, 51 Am. Rep. 386, decided in January, 1884, was a case of negligence, where two empty horse cars of the defendant, fastened together one behind the other, and drawn by a single horse, were driven slowly over the company's tracks in a public highway in the city of Providence by a driver occupying the platform in front of the forward car, from the stable, in Elmwood, to the repair shop, on Thurber's avenue. The plaintiff, a boy six years old, to outstrip a playmate with whom he was racing, jumped on the rear platform of the leading car, and soon afterwards fell off or jumped off, and was seriously injured. After nonsuit, the plaintiff petitioned for a new trial, which was denied; and Durfee, Ch. J., delivering the opinion, in referring to a dangerous object left exposed, without guard or attendant, in a place of common resort for children, said: "An object so left is a standing temptation to the natural curiosity of a child to examine it, or to his instinctive propensity to meddle and play with it. In Keffe v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, which was precisely like Stout v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 13,504, this peculiarity was specifically stated, and commented on as the ground of liability. 'The defendant knew,' say the court, 'that, by leaving this turntable unfastened and unguarded, it was not merely inviting young children to come upon the turntable, but was holding out an allurement, which, acting upon the natural instincts by which children are controlled, drew them by those instincts into hidden danger.' These cases seem to reach the limit of liability. They go beyond what was thought to be the limit in Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239." The court then proceeds to distinguish the case from the Turntable Cases. In Goodwin v. Nickerson & Dugan, an unreported case, being decision

No. 3,834 in this court, October term, 1891, the declaration set out that the defendants, being in the business of moving buildings, in the course thereof used their own lot, situated on South Bend street, in Pawtucket, a public highway, and surrounded by many houses, and entirely open and unfenced, and commonly used by children of tender age as a playground, for storing and placing thereon large quantities of timber and blocking, and were in the habit of piling such blocking and timber in such manner that certain long timbers, by being placed upon a tier of said blocking, were easily tilted or balanced, and formed what is commonly known as a "seesaw," thus rendering said timber upon said piles of blocking not only dangerous, from its liability to fall, but also attractive to children, etc., whereby the duty devolved upon the defendants to take such care in the piling of such timbers and blocking so to place them that they should not attract children thereto, and that the same should not be in danger of falling upon and crushing said children, and so to fence and otherwise to protect said lot and said pile of timber and blocking that children should be prevented from coming thereupon, or in such proximity thereto as to cause peril to life, and alleging defendants' neglect of said duty, whereby a large beam fell upon the plaintiff's son, less than four years old, who had been attracted to said lot by said timbers, and so grievously injured him as to cause death. The defendants demurred, and the court overruled the demurrer in a short rescript, in this wise: "The court is of the opinion that the plaintiff's case, as set forth in the declaration, falls within the class of cases represented by Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745." The recognition of the authority of the Stout Case accorded in the Bishop Case is altogether too dubious, and that in the Goodwin Case is too little considered, to establish a rule of law by which we are willing to abide in the case at bar and in future cases. In the Bishop Case the court not only does not follow the Stout Case, but attempts to distinguish it, and characterizes it as "seeming to reach the limit of liability," if not, indeed, intimating that it has exceeded it, by the reference to Mangan v. Atterton, L. R. 1 Exch. 239. In the Goodwin Case the Stout Case seems to have been accepted as authority as a matter of course, apparently without mature consideration, notwithstanding the very equivocal treatment of it in the Bishop Case, and the fact that our neighboring state of New Hampshire, in Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 9 Atl. 790, decided in 1886, four years before the Goodwin Case, declined to follow the Stout Case, in the following unambiguous terms: "We are not prepared to adopt the doctrine of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, and cases following it, that the owner of machinery or other property attractive to children is liable for injuries happening to children wrongfully interfering with it on his own premises. The owner is not an insurer of the safety of infant trespassers."

The reasoning of the Stout Case is so unsatisfactory that we cannot give it our approval, and it is evident from the trend of decisions during the last seven years that disapproval of the doctrine of that case has been greatly on the increase. The supreme court of Michigan, speaking as late as October 22, 1901, in Ryan v. Tower, 128 Mich. 463, 55 L. R. A. 310, 87 N. W. 641, said: "The rule laid down in Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout must be a general one, applicable to every one; and, aside from the impropriety of judicial legislation, a wise public policy should forbid such a sweeping innovation by judicial main strength. In innumerable cases the courts have applied and continue to apply the general rule that a landowner need not protect a trespasser, every case being an assertion of the principle which is disregarded in the cases relied upon by the plaintiff. We have cited a few of them,—enough, we think, to show that the great weight of authority does not sustain the principle of the Turntable Cases. While some of the courts have followed the rule of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, both the courts and profession have evinced a tendency to allow this innovation to go no further, and refuse to consider it applicable to other cases every way analogous. They speak of the cases generically, as the 'Turntable Cases,' and treat such cases as exceptional. We are of the opinion that they are exceptional, and that they are not based upon principle, but contravene one of the old and well-established rules of the law; and we therefore decline to recognize them as authority, preferring to adhere to the better doctrine of the other cases cited. The defendant owed no duty to these children, who were trespassers."

We find no satisfactory ground for the distinction sought to be made between infants and adults, in the duty of the owner or occupier of land to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe. Clark, J., in Frost v. Eastern R. Co. 64 N. H. 220, 9 Atl. 790, states the law very clearly in this wise: "A landowner is not required to take active measures to insure the safety of intruders, nor is he liable for an injury resulting from the lawful use of his premises to one entering upon them without right. A trespasser ordinarily assumes all risk of danger from the condition of the premises; and, to recover for an injury happening to him, he must show that it was wantonly inflicted, or that the owner or occupant, being present and acting, might have prevented the injury by the exercise of reasonable care after discovering the danger. . . . The maxim that a man must use his property so as not to incommode his neighbor only applies to neighbors who do not interfere with or enter upon it. . . . To hold the owner liable for consequential damages happening to trespassers from the lawful and beneficial use of his own land would be an unreasonable restriction of his enjoyment of it. . . . One having in his possession agricultural or mechanical tools is not responsible for injuries caused to trespassers by careless handling; nor is the owner of a fruit tree bound to cut it down or inclose it, or to exercise care in securing the staple and lock with which his ladder is fastened, for the protection of trespassing boys who may be attracted by the fruit. Neither is the owner or occupant of premises upon which there is a natural or artificial pond or a blueberry pasture legally required to exercise care in securing his gates and bars to guard against accidents to straying and trespassing children. The owner is under no duty to a mere trespasser to keep his premises safe, and the fact that the trespasser is an infant cannot have the effect to raise a duty where none otherwise exists. "The supposed duty has regard to the public at large, and cannot well exist as to one portion of the public, and not to another, under the same circumstances. In this respect, children, women, and men are upon the same footing. In cases where certain duties exist, infants may require greater care than adults, or a different kind of care; but precautionary measures, having for their object the protection of the public, must, as a rule, have reference to all classes alike." Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 53 Conn. 461, 4 Atl. 106."

Again, the Stout Case, it seems to us, errs in construing a mere temptation as an allurement sufficient to legally constitute an invitation to enter the premises of another. "Temptation," says Holmes, J., in delivering the opinion in Holbrook v. Aldrich, 168 Mass. 15, 36 L. R. A. 493, 46 N. E. 115, "is not always invitation. As the common law is understood by the most competent authorities, it does not excuse a trespass because there is a temptation to commit it, or hold property owners bound to contemplate the infraction of property rights because the temptation to untrained minds to infringe them might have been foreseen." It is not easy to give an exhaustive definition, within reasonable limits, of exactly what is meant by the words "allurement or inducement" that legally operate to constitute an invitation to enter the premises of another; but, as we have seen that mere temptation does not form such an inducement, a single illustration of what would form such an inducement will be sufficient for our purpose. Sweeney v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 10 Allen, 368, 87 Am. Dec. 644, from which we have already quoted as to the difference in the duty of an owner or occupier of land to one who enters upon his land by invitation, express or implied, and to one who enters without such invitation, even if he has a mere naked license or permission to enter or pass over the land, affords us that illustration. In that case a railroad company that had made a private crossing over its track, at grade, in a city, and allowed the public to use it as a highway, and stationed a flagman there to prevent persons from undertaking to cross when there was danger, was held liable in damages to one who, using due care, was induced to cross by a signal from the flagman that it was safe, and was injured by a collision which occurred through the flagman's carelessness.

We see no good purpose to be served by our further considering the general principles upon which the case at bar rests. Suffice it to say that we approve the cases hereinbefore cited as disapproving the doctrine in the Stout Case, as well as a masterly monograph entitled "Liability of Landowners to Children Entering without Permission," in 11 Harvard Law Review, 349-373, 434-448, by Hon. Jeremiah Smith, formerly one of the justices of the supreme court of New Hampshire, all of which have learnedly, and some of which have exhaustively, considered those principles and afford ample support for the views we entertain.

The plaintiff urges upon our attention the unreported case in this court of Lemieux v. Darling et al., Ex., No. 2,688 of 1900, wherein the plaintiff recovered, as one exactly analogous to the case at bar. In that case the plaintiff's intestate, a child five years old, while attracted to the unfenced lot of the defendants abutting on two public highways in Woonsocket, by an apple tree thereon, the branches whereof hung over an insecurely guarded well, situated 241 feet from one highway, and 95 feet from the other, fell into said well and was drowned. The court, in a brief rescript, said: "The principal question argued, namely, the liability of a landowner for injuries received by trespassing children from some dangerous object, agency, or condition negligently permitted by such landowner to exist on the land trespassed upon, is not before us. No ruling of the court denying such liability was asked for by the defendants." After a brief recital of the instructions given by the trial justice to the jury, followed by the words, "and no exception was taken by the defendants to such instructions," the rescript concludes as follows: "There is no evidence that the plaintiff knew that the well was not securely covered so that it would be safe, and therefore the jury were warranted in finding that he was not negligent." That case seems to us to furnish no authority for the case at bar, for in the Lemieux Case the defendants, by not raising any question of the defendants' liability to the trespassing child, practically admitted that they had been guilty of a neglected duty, and defended against their liability thereon, on the ground that the child had been guilty of contributory negligence, whereas the question in the case at bar is simply whether, on the facts alleged in the declaration,—construing the word "invited," contained therein, as referring only to a constructive invitation, as explained in the quotation from the plaintiff's brief hereinbefore set forth,—the defendant was liable on any neglect of duty he owed to the plaintiff's intestate. With such a construction of the word "invited," used in the first count, as intended by the plaintiff's counsel, already explained, leaving both counts without an allegation of invitation to the infant, express or implied, other than a constructive one, amounting at most to a mere license to enter upon the land, we are of the opinion that neither count of the declaration states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because there is no breach alleged of any legal duty the defendant owed the infant; and, of course, if there was no duty owed, there could be no neglect of duty, and the infant's injury was caused by his own negligent act, solely, in approaching the fire. We have already decided that the constructive invitation set out, or intended to be set out, and hence treated by us as such, is not a sufficient invitation to cast a legal duty upon the defendant in regard to said infant, other than not wilfully subjecting him to injury; and, as no such wilful injury has been alleged, we fail to see how the suit can be sustained without allegation and proof of an invitation to the infant, express or implied, to enter upon said premises.

The plaintiff raises the point whether the question of what is an attraction for children is not one for the jury. In our view of the law, the question in this case is not whether a fire is or is not attractive to a child, but whether, on the undisputed facts alleged in this case,—for the demurrer admits them to be true,—there was any duty on the owner or occupier of the land on which this fire was located to guard the child against it. Whether the facts alleged, not being questioned, raised a duty on the defendant in favor of the child, it seems to us, is a question of law for the court, that can properly be decided on demurrer. In Ritz v. Wheeling, 45 W. Va. 262, 43 L. R. A. 148, 31 S. E. 993, Brannon, president of the West Virginia court of appeals, on page 263, 45 W. Va., page 150, 43 L. R. A., and page 994, 31 S. E. says: "The case is not one involving credibility of witnesses, or weight of evidence, or the proper inferences and deductions from evidence, which are matters proper for the consideration of a jury; for the material facts of the case are undisputed, and the case presents simply the question of law, whether, upon the facts, a liability rests on the city. . . . Where the case turns on the weight and effect of the evidence in proving or not proving facts necessary to support the action, and the evidence appreciably goes to prove such facts, it ought to go to the jury, as a verdict upon such evidence gives it a force which it might not have with the judge before verdict, and fortifies the case more against the action of the court, as the court cannot set the verdict aside unless plainly and decidedly contrary to or without evidence; but where the case is not such, but one of undisputed or indisputable facts, leaving it only a matter of law whether the facts show a liability on the defendant, the court should take the case from the jury, and direct a verdict, if the evidence shows no case for the plaintiff, because, if there were a verdict for him, it would be a finding against law, and the court always annuls a verdict against law upon conceded or indisputable facts."

For the reasons hereinbefore set forth, we think the demurrers to both counts of the declaration must be sustained.

Demurrers sustained, and case remitted to the Common Pleas Division for further proceedings.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

(November 29, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Knox County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for slander. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Green & Shields, for plaintiff in error:

By an absolutely privileged communication is meant a publication in respect of which, by reason of the occasion upon which it is made, no remedy can be had in a civil action for libel.

Townshend, Slander & Libel, 248, § 202; Ruohs v. Backer, 6 Heisk. 405, 19 Am. Rep. 598; Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 153, 5 S. W. 602; Lea v. White, 4 Sneed, 113; 1 Starkie, Slander & Libel, 403, 404; Cooke, Defamation, 48.

NOTE.—As to privilege of defamatory testimony, see also, in this series, Cooper v. Phipps (Or.) 22 L. R. A. 836, and note; and Blakeslee v. Carroll (Conn.) 25 L. R. A. 106.

pleading, see Randall v. Hamilton (La.) 22 L. R. A. 649, and note; Sherwood v. Powell (Minn.) 29 L. R. A. 153; Jones v. Brownlee (Mo.) 53 L. R. A. 445; and Grant v. Hayne (La.) 54 L. R. A. 630.

Before a witness can be held liable in a civil action, it must be shown that his statements were not only false and malicious, but that they were not pertinent to the issues, and not in response to questions asked by counsel.

Messrs. Templeton, Carlock, & Templeton, for defendant in error:

Defamatory words spoken or written of a party, which prejudice such person in his profession or trade or business, are actionable in themselves without proof of special damages.

Continental Nat. Bank v. Bowdre Bros. 92 Tenn. 723, 23 S. W. 131; Mattson v. Albert, 97 Tenn. 232, 36 S. W. 1090.

Defamatory statements made by a witness under oath in the course of judicial proceedings are not absolutely, but only prima facie or conditionally, privileged.

Proof of actual malice may destroy the privilege.

18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1048.

Shields, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for alleged slanderous words spoken by Cooley, the plaintiff in error, of and concerning Galyon, the defendant in error, while being examined as a witness before the master upon a reference to ascertain damages resulting from the wrongful suing out of an injunction issued in the case of Eckle et al. against the Florence Crittendon Home, lately pending in the chancery court of Knox county. Galyon and Cooley were both contractors and builders residing in Knoxville, and neither was a party to the chancery cause. The declaration contains two counts,—one in slander and one in libel,—both predicated upon the same words, which are hereinafter set out, in stating the averments of a special plea filed by the defendant. It is averred that the words were falsely and maliciously spoken and published of and concerning the plaintiff, with respect to his occupation and business as a builder and contractor, to his damage $5,000. The defendant filed a plea of not guilty, and a special plea in which he says that he uttered the language complained of while being examined as a witness in a suit pending in the chancery court of Knox county, styled "G. B. Eckle et al. vs. Florence Crittendon Home," in answer to questions put to him by counsel in the said cause; that the bill in said cause was filed to enjoin the Florence Crittendon Home from completing a house then in course of construction, and designed as a home for fallen women; that an injunction was issued in said cause, and remained in force until the cause was heard and the bill dismissed; that upon a reference to the master to hear proof, and report what damages, if any, the Florence Crittendon Home had sustained by reason of the wrongful suing out of said injunction, it was proved that at the time the injunction was issued the Florence Crittendon Home had awarded the contract for the building of said house to Thomas & Turner, contractors, for the contract price of $2,497, and that after the dissolution of the injunction they refused to carry out the contract, because of an advance in wages and material, unless the Florence Crittendon Home would pay them the additional sum of $303.90; that the complainants, Eckle and others, claimed that Galyon, who was alleged to be a reliable contractor, was then offering to do the building for the original contract price of $2,497, and that therefore the defendant was not damaged by the wrongful suing out of the injunction; that upon this reference the defendant, who was in no way interested in or connected with said litigation, was called and sworn as a witness in behalf of the Florence Crittendon Home, to prove the advance in the price of labor and material, and, on cross-examination by the complainant's solicitors, he was asked questions, and made answers thereto, as follows:

Q. Is Mr. Galyon a reliable contractor?

A. I know Mr. Galyon hasn't paid us for some bills that he bought last year. We would not sell him lumber to-day without cash.

Q. He is considered reliable with respect to his work, is he not?

A. That depends on how broad a sweep you give the word "reliable." If you mean he faithfully performs all his contracts in every particular, I must say he is not reliable. In other words, I will be a little more explicit. He will complete a contract, and put in an inferior grade of material than what is called for in the specifications.

That these answers had reference to the said inquiry, and were fairly responsive to the questions asked him by counsel; and that they were absolutely privileged, under the law. He denies that he uttered the words maliciously. While this defense could have been made under the general issue, it could also be made by special plea. Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 148, 5 S. W. 602. Issue was joined, and the case was tried by the circuit judge and a jury, and upon the trial the plaintiff introduced the solicitor of the complainants in the cause of Eckle and others against the Florence Crittendon Home, as a witness in his behalf, and had him identify the original bill, the answer, the decree denying the complainants relief, and ordering the reference to the master to ascertain the damages sustained by the defendant by reason of the wrongful issuance of the injunction, and the deposition given by defendant, Cooley, in the chancery cause; the original papers being used by consent, all of which were then read in evidence by the plaintiff. Upon cross-examination the witness identified the depositions of other witnesses taken in the cause, the report of the master allowing damages to the defendant in that cause, and the decree confirming the same, which were then read to the jury by defendant's attorney. Other evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to prove that the defendant gave the deposition read, and entertained malice toward the plaintiff. The proof introduced by the plaintiff sustained the averments of the special plea, and upon the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the defendant filed a demurrer, in proper form, thereto, which was overruled by the court, and the damages of the plaintiff assessed by the jury at $500, and judgment given therefor; and the defendant has brought the case before this court, and assigns error.

For the plaintiff it is said that the defendant, by calling out and reading in evidence those portions of the record in the chancery cause which the plaintiff had not offered, introduced original evidence in his behalf, and lost his right to demur to the evidence of the plaintiff, and that for this reason the action of the court in overruling the demurrer was correct, regardless of other questions. It is true that, if a defendant introduce any original evidence in his behalf, he cannot demur to the evidence of the plaintiff; but, Can it be said that the evidence elicited by the defendant in this case was original evidence? Clearly not. The plaintiff had introduced part of the record in the chancery cause, and it was perfectly competent for the defendant to call for the remainder of it. It would have been the better practice to have required the plaintiff to read the entire record; but, having failed to do so, the defendant had the right to call for the rest of it, and examine the witness then upon the stand in relation to it. This was legitimate cross-examination, in the strictest sense, as the evidence brought out related to and was germane to that elicited in the examination in chief. But whether germane or not, the defendant had the right to bring out upon cross-examination any matter pertinent to the issue; the rule in Tennessee being that the cross-examination is only limited by relevancy and competency of the evidence sought to be introduced, and the defendant, by exercising this right, is not precluded from demurring to the evidence. This question was fully discussed in the case of Sands v. Southern R. Co. 108 Tenn. 1, 64 S. W. 478, and the rule there stated as here applied.

The question upon which this case must be determined is whether the language imputed to the defendant is actionable. It is well settled that defamatory words falsely spoken or written of one, which prejudice him in his business or occupation, are actionable, without proof of special damage; and therefore the publication of the words imputed to the defendant, other questions out of the way, would entitle plaintiff to recover. Continental Nat. Bank v. Boudre Bros. 92 Tenn. 723, 23 S. W. 131; Mattson v. Albert, 97 Tenn. 232, 36 S. W. 1090. The defendant, however, insists that the words here spoken and published are absolutely privileged, on account of the occasion when done, regardless of the presence of malice; the only inquiry allowed being whether they were pertinent to the issues involved in the cause in which the defendant was examined as a witness, and fairly responsive to the questions propounded to him by counsel; while for the plaintiff it is said that the words are only qualifiedly or conditionally privileged, and, malice appearing, they are actionable. The question is therefore presented whether the answers of the defendant in question are absolutely, or only conditionally, privileged.

"By an absolutely privileged communication," says Mr. Townshend in his work on Slander and Libel [4th ed. § 209, p. 297], "is not to be understood a publication for which the publisher is in no wise responsible; but it means a publication in respect of which, by reason of the occasion upon which it is made, no remedy can be had in a civil action of slander or libel. A conditionally privileged communication is a publication made on an occasion which furnishes a prima facie legal excuse for the making of it, and which is privileged unless some additional fact is shown which so alters the character of the occasion as to prevent it furnishing a legal excuse." Townshend, Slander & Libel, p. 248. § 202, cited and approved in Ruohs v. Backer, 6 Heisk. 405, 19 Am. Rep. 598. In Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 191, it is said: "A witness in the box is absolutely privileged in answering all the questions asked him by the counsel on either side; and, even if he volunteers an observation (a practice much to be discouraged), still, if it has reference to the matter in issue, or fairly arises out of any question asked him by counsel, though only going to his credit, such observation will also be privileged. . . . But a remark made by a witness in the box, wholly irrelevant to the matter of inquiry, uncalled for by any question of counsel, and introduced by the witness maliciously, for his own purposes, would not be privileged, and would also probably be a contempt of court." This statement of the law is quoted and approved by this court in the case of Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 150, 5 S. W. 602. In the case of Lea v. White, 4 Sneed, 113, 115, it is said: "There is a . . . class of cases which are absolutely privileged, and depend in no respect for their protection upon their bona fides. The occasion is an absolute privilege, and the only questions are whether the occasion existed, and whether the matter complained of was pertinent to the occasion. . . . In this class are embraced judicial proceedings. The proceedings connected with the judicature of the country are so important to the public good that the law holds that nothing which may be therein said with probable cause, whether with or without malice, can be slander, and, in like manner, that nothing written with probable cause under the sanction of such occasion can be libel. The pertinency of the matter to the occasion is that which is meant by probable cause, and probable cause is, in this class of absolutely privileged communications, what bona fides is to the class of conditionally privileged communications, which, we have seen, are protected unless there is malice in fact." In the case of Cooper v. Phipps, 24 Or. 357, 22 L. R. A. 839, 33 Pac. 986, the court said: "While there is some conflict in the adjudged cases as to whether witnesses are absolutely exempt from liability to an action for defamatory words uttered or published in the course of judicial proceedings, it is agreed by all the authorities that they are presumptively so; and, before a witness can be held liable in a civil action, this presumption must be overcome by showing affirmatively that such statements were not only false and malicious, but that they were not pertinent to the issues, and not in response to questions asked by counsel." In the same case the court further said: "In this country many, and perhaps a majority, of the courts, have refused to adopt an absolute and unqualified privilege of a witness, as laid down by the English courts; but it is agreed that a witness is absolutely privileged as to everything said by him having relation or reference to the subject-matter of inquiry before the court, or in response to questions asked by counsel, and presumptively so as to all his statements." 24 Or. 357, 22 L. R. A. 840, 33 Pac. 986. In the case of Hoar v. Wood, 3 Met. 193, the court said: "We take the rule to be well settled by the authorities that words spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, though they are such as impute crime to another, and therefore, if spoken elsewhere, would import malice, and be actionable in themselves, are not actionable if they are applicable and pertinent to the subject of inquiry. The question, therefore, in such cases, is not whether the words spoken are true, not whether they are actionable in themselves, but whether they were spoken in the course of judicial proceedings, and whether they were relative and pertinent to the cause or subject of inquiry." In the case of Gardemal v. McWilliams, 43 La. Ann. 454, 9 So. 108, it is said: "Certain communications are absolutely privileged, and no person is liable, either civilly or criminally, in respect of anything published by him in the course of his duty in any judicial proceeding. This privilege extends to parties, counsel, witnesses, jurors, and judges in a judicial proceeding, to proceedings in legislative bodies, and to all who, in the discharge of public duty, or the honest pursuit of private right, are compelled to take part in the administration of justice or in legislation." Citing Heard, Libel & Slander, §§ 90, 103, 110; Newell, Defamation, p. 423, §§ 26, 27; Fisk v. Soniat, 33 La. Ann. 1400; Vinas v. Merchants' Mut. Ins. Co. 33 La. Ann. 1265. The case of Shadden v. McElwee, 86 Tenn. 146, 5 S. W. 602, is relied upon as supporting the position of the plaintiff, but it does not do so. That case was before this court upon the demurrer interposed by the defendant to the replication of the plaintiff to a plea averring that the words upon which the action was predicated were uttered while the defendant was being examined as a witness in a certain suit, in response to questions propounded to him, 60 L. R. A.

and that his answers were responsive and privileged, replying that the words were not uttered in response to questions asked defendant while on the witness stand, and that they were not pertinent to the issues in said suit, but were voluntarily injected into his testimony, and falsely and maliciously spoken for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff, and the demurrer was properly overruled. But it is there expressly held, upon the authority of Lea v. White, 4 Sneed, 113, 115, and Odgers, Libel & Slander, p. 191, which are quoted and approved in the opinion of the court, that, when the communications of a witness are fairly responsive to the questions propounded, or pertinent to the inquiry, they are absolutely privileged, although he may have entertained malice toward the plaintiff. It is immaterial that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant were parties to the cause in which the defendant was called to testify. The majority of witnesses are not parties to the cause in which they are examined, and facts in relation to other strangers to the litigation often become the subject of necessary inquiry. If the privilege was confined to parties, it would be reduced to narrow limits, and the proper administration of justice would be greatly embarrassed and made difficult.

Applying these principles to this case, the question is not whether the words spoken by the defendant were false and malicious, but, Were they spoken in a judicial proceeding, and were they relevant and pertinent to the subject of inquiry in that proceeding, or responsive to questions propounded to the defendant by counsel while being examined therein as a witness? If they were, they are absolutely privileged, and the plaintiff's action must fail. That the words were spoken in the course of a judicial proceeding is conceded; and the only question that remains to be determined is, Were the answers of the witness pertinent to the inquiry, or responsive to the questions asked by the counsel? The issue being tried in the chancery cause, in relation to which the defendant was examined as a witness for the Florence Crittendon Home, was what damages it had sustained by being delayed in building a house by the injunction issued against it; and defendant was called to testify as to the difference in the cost of material and construction at the time the injunction was issued and when the bill was dismissed, as bearing upon this issue. The plaintiff, Galyon, had offered to build the house for the same price for which the defendant had contracted it when enjoined, and the question arose whether he was a reliable contractor, and would and could comply with a contract to do the building if it were let to him; and, with a view of proving this, the witness was cross-examined by the solicitor for the complainants, and made the answers of which the plaintiff complains. These answers were clearly pertinent to the investigation. If Mr. Galyon was a reliable contractor, his proposition to build the house tended to prove that the defendant had sustained no loss; and, if he was unreliable, the effect of the proposition as evidence was weakened. The answers were also fairly, and evidently intended to be directly, responsive to the questions propounded to the witness. If the plaintiff did not pay for the material he used in building, or did not use the character of material called for in his contract, he was not a reliable contractor.

We are of the opinion that the words spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff were, on account of the occasion, absolutely privileged, and that no action can be maintained upon them. There is therefore no evidence to sustain a verdict against the defendant, and the demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence should have been allowed.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the plaintiff's suit dismissed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

SINGER MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

Frank RIOS.

(.....Tex.....)

A stipulation in a chattel mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to take possession of the mortgaged property upon failure of the mortgagor to make payments secured thereby is not contrary to public policy, and will authorize the mortgagee to take peaceable possession of the property, even against the will of the mortgagor.

(January 8, 1903.)

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District of questions arising upon appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Travis County Court in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful seizure of property in plaintiff's possession. Answer favorable to appellant returned.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Faulk & Patterson, for appellant:

A party who has the right to possession of property, by the express terms of a contract, upon the happening of a certain event named in the contract, is not required to resort to the courts for the purpose of securing or obtaining possession of the property so long as he can exercise his right to take possession of it without committing a breach of the peace or violating some criminal law.

White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Conner, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1125, 64 S. W. 841; Walsh v. Taylor, 39 Md. 595; Street v. Sinclair, 71 Ala. 110; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 271; Brown v. Phillips, 3 Bush. 656; Boone, Mortg. § 276, p. 396; Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 434, p. 448.

The clause authorizing and empowering the defendant to take possession, in the capacity of mortgagee, of the mortgaged property upon failure of plaintiff to pay the unpaid purchase money when due, and to sell the same at public or private sale, is a valid contract stipulation which formed an essential part of the consideration of the mortgage, and which the parties to the mortgage had the legal right and power to insert in the mortgage.

NOTE.—As to right to take possession of and all mortgaged chattels, see Robison v. Gray (Iowa) 23 L. R. A. 780, and note. 60 L. R. A.

Plaintiff having expressly agreed in the mortgage that the defendant should have the right to take possession of the mortgaged property upon his failure to pay the unpaid purchase money when due, it was not necessary for the defendant to obtain plaintiff's consent.

Messrs. Brooks & Shelley, for appellee:

The provisions of the chattel mortgage relied upon were not sufficient to justify the taking possession.

Gaines, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes to us upon the following certificate:

"The court of civil appeals of the third supreme judicial district of Texas certifies that the above styled and numbered cause on appeal from the county court of Travis county, Texas, is now pending in the court of civil appeals, and states that the appellee's cause of action is for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the de-defendant's agent entering the place of business of plaintiff, in the city of Austin, and there and then taking possession of a certain sewing machine which defendant had sold to the plaintiff on the instalment plan. The damages alleged are $65, the value of the machine; that his business as a merchant tailor has been interfered with and obstructed, and that he has been deprived of the use of the machine; and that, on account of being deprived of the same, the work done by him has been greatly decreased,—with amount of actual damages alleged to be $250, with also a claim for exemplary damages at $200. Among other facts pleaded in the defendant's answer, there are averments to the effect that the sewing machine was sold to the plaintiff on the instalment plan, and that there was then due on the same a certain amount, which was unpaid, and that at the time of sale a mortgage was retained on the machine to secure the amount that may become due, and that there was a stipulation in the mortgage which authorized the defendant to take possession of the sewing machine, either with or without process of law; that the plaintiff had failed and refused to pay the unpaid purchase money when due; and that the machine was taken quietly and peaceably, without the use of force, by virtue of this stipulation in the mortgage, which is as follows: 'If said mortgagor shall fail to pay any instalment as it becomes due, then all said instalments unpaid shall at once become due and payable, and said mortgagee, or its representatives, shall have the right, and is hereby authorized and empowered, to take possession of said goods and chattels, with or without process of law; said mortgagor hereby waiving any claim or action for trespass or damage on account of said taking.' It is contended by the defendant that under this provision in the mortgage it took the machine, and that it was authorized to take the same, and this fact was pleaded as a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action. The trial court sustained a demurrer to so much of the defendant's answer as sought to justify the taking by virtue of the above provision in the mortgage, but submitted to the jury the issue as to whether or not the machine was taken from the possession of the plaintiff by and with the consent of the plaintiff, and, if such was the case, to find in favor of the defendant. The defendant, upon the trial of the case, asked a charge, which was by the court refused, presenting to the jury the issue as pleaded,—that the defendant had authority to take possession of the machine by virtue of the agreement contained in the mortgage, as above set out. There is evidence in the record which shows that the machine was taken from the building occupied by the plaintiff as a tailor shop without his consent, and against the express wishes of the party in whose possession it was at the time it was taken; that the machine was then in use by the plaintiff in his business as a tailor. And there is also evidence which tends to show that the defendant, in taking the machine, used no force or violence, and no breach of the peace was committed at that time. It also appears as a fact that at the time the machine was taken there was a balance due the defendant, as a part of the purchase price of the machine. It is also pleaded, and there is evidence to sustain the averments, that the machine was taken by the defendant for the purpose of enforcing the provision of its mortgage and lien on the machine. Verdict and judgment in the trial court were in favor of the plaintiff on all of the items of damages claimed, with a credit in favor of the defendant for the balance due upon the machine; and for the balance remaining, judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor.

"Under the above statement, the court of civil appeals for the third supreme judicial district of Texas certifies to the supreme court of Texas the following question: Although the taking of the machine at the time was without the consent of the plaintiff, did the stipulation contained in the mortgage, as above quoted, authorize the defendant to enter the place of business of the plaintiff and take actual possession of the machine, without then and there first obtaining the permission and consent of the plaintiff? In other words, did the consent given in the provision of the mortgage quoted authorize the taking, where it is, as here, shown by the facts that no force or violence or breach of the peace was committed in taking the machine? And, if such taking was justifiable under the terms of the mortgage as quoted, would such fact be a defense, either in whole or in part, to the plaintiff's cause of action?"

We are of the opinion that the question should be answered in the affirmative. Clearly, unless the stipulation in the mortgage, which purported to give to appellant the right to take possession of the sewing machine upon default of payment be held of no effect, its agent committed no wrong by a peaceable seizure of the property for the purpose of paying the debt. The stipulation is valid unless it is contrary to public policy. According to the well-known dictum of an English judge, public policy "is a very unruly horse, and, when you once get astride it, you never know where it will carry you." Richardson v. Mellish, 2 Bing. 229. This striking illustration admonishes us that the words "public policy" are vague in meaning and dangerous of application, and that, unless we exercise due discrimination, we are likely to fall into error when we come to apply them to the construction of a contract, with a view to determine the validity of its provisions. Freedom of contract is the rule, subject to the exception that a party cannot bind himself to do that which is by law prohibited or declared to be illegal, or which is manifestly detrimental to public morals or the public good. The question then arises, What consequence, injurious to the public, is a stipulation of the character of that under consideration calculated to produce? To this it may be vaguely answered that it tends to a breach of the peace. But the reply is, so do many other contracts, the validity of which is never called in question. Certainly no breach of the peace is likely to occur provided the mortgagor in such case does what he has contracted to do and what it is his duty to do, namely, in case of default to surrender the property upon demand of the mortgagee. On the other hand, should he make forcible resistance, this does not justify the mortgagee in using force to overcome his resistance. The law hardly proceeds upon the assumption that either party will violate his agreement, and that therefore a breach of the peace may arise. The proposition that such a stipulation is valid, and that the mortgagee may take peaceable possession of the property without the consent, and even over the protest of the mortgagor, is sustained by the great weight of authority. The following cases are in point: Street v. Sinclair, 71 Ala. 110; Burns v. Campbell, 71 Ala. 271; Walsh v. Taylor, 39 Md. 592; North v. Williams, 120 Pa. 109, 13 Atl. 723; White Sewing Mach. Co. v. Conner, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1125, 64 S. W. 841; Heath v. Randall, 4 Cush. 195; Satterwhite v. Kennedy, 3 Strobb. L. 457; Nichols v. Webster, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 203. Such is the rule recognized by the text-writers. Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 434; 1 Cobbey, Chat. Mortg. § 510; Pingrey, Chat. Mortg. § 989; Boone, Mortg. § 276. The authorities relied upon in support of the proposition that the stipulation in question did not justify the taking of the property against the consent of the mortgagor are from our own courts. The first is Lofthus v. Maxey, 73 Tex. 242, 11 S. W. 272. As to the evidence adduced upon the trial, the case is meagerly reported. The petition charged that, in connection with the taking, the defendants threatened the plaintiff with violence and committed an assault upon her. How these allegations were sustained by the proof, the report does not disclose. The court charged the jury that, if the property was taken without the consent of the plaintiff, and "if the manner of defendants, or either of them, in the taking, was by threats, or in an insolent, overbearing, and insulting manner, done in such a way as would naturally outrage the feelings of plaintiff," then they should find for plaintiff. It was held that this charge was correct. In the opinion the court says: "We think the charge of the court to the effect that, if the instrument alleged to have been executed by Sallie Maxey was genuine, as asserted by defendants, it furnished no justification or defense for the defendants, is correct. Without such an instrument they had the right to remove the property peaceably and with the consent of the parties having it in lawful possession, while with it they had no right to make such removal forcibly or against the will of plaintiffs." We think, in so far as the opinion asserts that a peaceable taking against the will of the mortgagor was wrongful, it is clearly a dictum. The petition alleged the taking of the property, but did not state its value, and we understand the suit was to recover damages for an assault and other insulting conduct. Judging by the report of the case, the question of the right to take the property peaceably without the consent of the plaintiff was not discussed in the briefs of counsel upon either side, and, as we think, was a point not necessarily involved in the determination of the suit. In Gillett v. Moody (Tex. Civ. App.) 54 S. W. 35, the court of civil appeals for the fourth district held that, under similar provision in a chattel mortgage, it was unlawful to enter a house by force and threats for the purpose of taking and carrying away the mortgaged property. That is not the question certified in this case. The case of Culver v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 62 S. W. 922, was a conviction for an aggravated assault, in which the court of criminal appeals held that the fact that the assault was made in an attempt by the defendant to take mortgaged property under a like stipulation in a chattel mortgage was not a justification of the act. What is said in the opinion to the effect that the defendant had no right to take the property without the consent of the assaulted party was not involved in the decision of the case. Clearly, the right to take the property did not justify the assault. So far, we have not adverted to the case of Harling v. Creech, 88 Tex. 300, 31 S. W. 357. In that case, in answering a certified question, this court, after construing the instrument in controversy to be a chattel mortgage, said: "The instruments being chattel mortgages, the vendor had the rights of a mortgagee under a chattel mortgage containing the stipulations of right to take possession, which would be to take possession of the property if he deemed himself insecure, or the debt not being paid, and to hold or dispose of the property in the character of mortgagee, and not as owner." It is claimed by counsel for appellee that this was a dictum. Without pausing to inquire whether the remark was called for in a decision of the question there certified, we deem it sufficient to say that, if a dictum, it is, in our opinion, a correct announcement of the law.

FORT WORTH & RIO GRANDE RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

SOUTHWESTERN TELEGRAPH & TELEPHONE COMPANY.

statute permitting the condemnation of any lands, whether owned by private persons in fee or in any less estate, or by any corporation, whether acquired by purchase or by virtue of any provision in the charter of such corporation.

2. The condemnation of the right to construct a telegraph line along a railroad right of way is not prevented by the fact that a right of way for the line might be obtained over other property or in other ways.

(January 8, 1903.)

CERTIFICATION by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District of questions arising upon appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Brown County Court in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to condemn a right of way. Answers returned favorable to appellee.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. N. L. Lindale, for appellant:

Under the statute of Texas, a telegraph and telephone line having the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, desiring to enter upon public or private lands for the purpose of constructing and operating its telegraph and telephone lines, "may appropriate so much of said lands as may be necessary," and no more.

Sayles's Civ. Stat. (Tex.) arts. 698, 699.

Appellee's authority to condemn is by legislative enactment, and it can exercise this right only in so far as the legislature, in express terms, provides.

Sayles's Civ. Stat. (Tex.) arts. 698, 699; Sabine & E. T. R. Co. v. Gulf & I. R. Co. 92 Tex. 164, 46 S. W. 784.

There must be shown an actual necessity for the taking, such as a physical impossibility of avoiding it, before there can be any taking at all.

Ibid.

There can be no taking of lands already devoted to a public use for the purpose of devoting it to another and wholly different use, unless it be shown that it is for the public benefit, and of a higher order than the use for which it is already used, as well as that it cannot be practically constructed in any other way.

Where a railroad company has acquired a right of way 100 feet in width, and which is necessary for the use of said road, it cannot be appropriated to another and different use, except where the legislature in express terms has authorized it to be done, or where such authority arises from necessary implication.

Mr. George H. Fearons also for appellant.

Messrs. McLaurin & Wosencraft, for appellee:

A telegraph and telephone line designed for use by the public is held in Texas to have the same rights in acquiring right of way as if it were a telegraph line only, and is, under the law, a recognized public use for which property may be taken under the eminent domain power of the state.

Tex. Rev. Stat. arts. 698, 699; San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 93 Tex. 313, 49 L. R. A. 459, 55 S. W. 117.

All kinds of property, and every variety and degree of interest in property, may be taken under the power of eminent domain.

railway company, with wires suspended from pole to pole on cross arms, actually takes from the railway, if anything, only the spaces occupied by the poles, and, in addition, only deprives the owner of the right of way of the free and uninterrupted use of such space above the right of way as is actually occupied by the wires and cross arms.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certified questions from the court of civil appeals for the third district, as follows:

"This is a condemnation proceeding instituted by the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company against the Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railway Company, and resulting in a judgment in favor of the telegraph and telephone company, in accordance with, and subject to, the limitations stated in its petition, and an appeal by the railway company. The essential averments of the plaintiff's petition are as follows:

"That the plaintiff is a corporation duly incorporated, and is duly authorized and empowered to do business as a telegraph and telephone company in the state of Texas, having complied fully with the requirements of the law relative to foreign corporations in that regard, and holding a permit from the state of Texas to do business therein. And plaintiff further says that it is duly and legally authorized and empowered to erect, own, operate, and maintain magnetic telegraph and telephone lines for the use of the public in the rapid transmission of intelligence in the states of Texas, Arkansas, New York, and elsewhere in the United States of America, being duly chartered for that purpose."

"(4) That the said defendant is a public highway and post road of the United States; and that plaintiff has, in all things, complied with the acts of Congress of the United States in such cases made and provided, and has filed its written acceptance of all the restrictions and obligations imposed by the acts of Congress with the Postmaster General of the United States, as is required by law, and that plaintiff is entitled to all the rights and privileges conferred upon telegraph companies by the acts of Congress of the United States in such cases made and provided.

"(5) That the defendant is a private corporation, duly incorporated and organized, and transacting the business usually conducted by railway companies in the public service of carrying passengers, freights, and the United States mails for hire, being a post road. This business defendant conducts through and over its railroad known 60 L. R. A.

as Ft. Worth & Rio Grande Railroad, by it owned and operated from and between the cities of Stephenville and Brownwood, in the state of Texas, and passing through the cities of Dublin, Comanche, and other towns in the state of Texas."

"(7) That plaintiff has already built and is maintaining a system of several thousand miles of telegraphs and telephone lines in the states of Texas, Arkansas, and New York, by it now owned and operated for the use of the public for the rapid transmission of intelligence for commercial purposes, and for other public purposes.

"(8) That, as an addition to the part of the said system of telegraph and telephone lines now maintained and operated by plaintiff as aforesaid, and to be used for the same purposes as said system (to wit, to the service of the public) and in connection therewith, plaintiff desires to build upon defendant's right of way a telegraph and telephone line, hereinafter called "additional line," from the said city of Stephenville, in Erath county, Texas, in a southerly direction, at a distance near to and parallel with (except as hereinafter shown) defendant's main line of railway, to the city of Brownwood, in Brown county, Texas.

"(9) That plaintiff and defendant, after considering this matter together, cannot agree upon a purchase by plaintiff of a right of way upon, along, and over said lands and property hereinafter more particularly described for said additional line, nor can they agree as to amount of damages that may be caused to the lands and property of defendant by the construction, operation, and maintenance thereon of the said additional line; hence plaintiff desires to have a right of way along, upon, and over the said lands and property condemned in accordance with law, in order that plaintiff may lawfully construct, operate, and maintain thereon its said additional telegraph and telephone line.

"(10) That plaintiff shall locate said telegraph and telephone (additional line) at a distance of 35 feet from and in a direction easterly of the center line between the rails of the main track of defendant's railway, and parallel with said center line of said railway, except where deflections are made as herein elsewhere shown; that, in order to do so, it will be necessary and most advantageous for plaintiff to build, operate, and maintain its said (additional) line in, along, upon, and over certain land owned and occupied by the defendant as a right of way for its said railroad, at the place and in the manner herein indicated, which land is hereinafter more fully described, and the points of entering upon and leaving the said land are hereinafter specially given.

"(11) That the poles, wires, and cross arms shall be so placed upon said land, and at all times thereon so kept and maintained, as not to obstruct any private roadway or railway crossing; and so as not to impede the free use by the said defendant of the said lands for the purpose of accommodating public travel upon said railway; and so as not to impede the defendant in the use of said railroad for any other purpose as a common carrier; and so as not to obstruct the free use of, or come in contact with, any other telegraph or telephone line now existing upon the said land along and upon the right of way of the defendant over the same; and in such manner as not to interfere with any structure, drain, or ditch upon the defendant's right of way now there existing and by defendant used in its railway purposes, or that may hereafter be there placed by defendant in the necessary use of its right of way for railway purposes.

"And plaintiff shall only have an easement in defendant's right of way for the purpose of building, operating, and maintaining thereon its said telegraph and telephone line, having ingress and egress to and from said lands for that purpose; and the building, operating, and maintaining of said line shall not prevent free passage under the wire to defendant, nor the use of timbers, soil, rock, gravel, or any other material between the poles or beyond the wires from the railway; and if the defendant shall at any time desire to change the location of its tracks, or to construct any new tracks or sidetracks, or erect any depots or other structures, or to open any gravel pits or rock quarries, or to remove any material or soil, or in case the poles and wires shall be found to interfere with the running or operating of cars or trains upon the defendant's tracks, or to endanger the safety of employees of defendant or passengers traveling on defendant's trains,—then the plaintiff shall remove the poles and wires from the point of interference, at its own cost, to any point on defendant's right of way, or on the same side of defendant's main track of railway, near and adjacent to the former position occupied by said poles and wires as may be designated by defendant, such removal to take place after written notice for a reasonable time to be given plaintiff by defendant, stating why the removal is desired and the place to which the removal shall be made.

"(12) That, in erecting the said telegraph and telephone line in, along, upon, and over the said tracts of land, it will be necessary and most advantageous for plaintiff to set its poles in the ground in a single line with each other, and parallel with (except as hereinafter shown) the center line, between the rails of the main track of defendant's said railroad, at the distance of 144½ feet each from the next preceding pole in the line, except where different distances between the poles are hereinafter specially given. The poles are to be 25 feet long, 7 inches in diameter at the top, and not exceeding 18 inches in diameter at the lower end, except those poles for which different length and sizes are hereinafter specially given. The poles are to be erected perpendicular to the ground, except as to those hereinafter specified, and set into it 6 feet. To each of these poles, at right angles to it, and at right angles to the center line between the rails of the main track of defendant's railway, are to be firmly and securely attached three cross arms, each to be 6 feet 60 L. R. A.

long and 4 inches by 4 inches in size, and made fast to the poles at a point equidistant from the ends of the cross arms; the top edges of the three cross arms shall be 3 inches, 30 inches, and 52 inches respectively below the top of the poles; and upon each side of the poles plaintiff will string wires attaching them to insulators, made fast to strong and durable wooden pins, which pins are to be attached securely to the cross arms; and the wires shall be so strung that each cross arm shall support six wires, three on each side of the pole; and the wires shall be strung taut, as above indicated, from pole to pole, for the transmission of plaintiff's telegraph and telephone messages in the service of the public. In measuring the distance to the said poles, in all cases the measurement shall be made to the center of the pole at the ground. In locating the distance, the telegraph and telephone line is to be built from the railroad, the measurement is to be to the several poles at the ground, from the center line, between the rails of the main track of defendant's railway, along lines drawn at right angles to said center line, and reaching from said center line to the center of the poles which are to support the wires of the said telegraph and telephone line. All poles that are longer than 30 feet shall be set in the ground to the depth of 7 feet. Into each cross arm shall be securely fastened a durable and strong wooden pin at the point where the wire is to be supported on the cross arm, and on each pin, protecting it from the wire, shall be securely fastened an insulator, to which the wire shall be attached. The poles will each occupy a space of 18 inches square, or 2¼ square feet of land.'

"The petition accurately describes the boundaries of appellant's property, and embraces allegations as follows:

"The appellant's property upon which appellee seeks to condemn a right of way is certain property held by appellant for right of way purposes for its railway, in the counties of Erath, Comanche, and Brown, in the state of Texas.

"That the lands over which appellee seeks to condemn a right of way "are connected throughout their entire length and constitute one entire and continuous tract or strip of land held by defendant as a right of way for its said railway, and along and upon which the defendant's said railway is built and operated." Within the said strip of land, defendant's right of way, said strip being 100 feet wide from end to end thereof, and practically at the center line thereof, from end to end, lengthwise said strip, is built the main track of defendant's railway.'

"The petition then gives the exact distance from the center of appellant's main track of every one of the few poles not occupying the pole line's specified distance of 35 feet from said main track. It gives also the length of every pole not of the specified height of the poles in the line. It further gives the number and dimensions of the cross arms, the number of wires, and all the plans, specifications, details, and measurements for the location and structure of the line.

"The petition further stipulates that appellant shall not be liable in damages for injury by fire to appellee's poles, and relieves appellant of any possible obligation to clear away combustible material from about the poles.

"The petition prays that damages be assessed for the condemnation as sought in the petition, and for the building, operating, and maintaining the line at the place and in the manner indicated in the petition, and for such other orders and judgments as the case may warrant.

"The defendant interposed, and the court overruled, the following special exception:

"Because plaintiff has no authority and right under the laws of this state to exercise the power of eminent domain in, along, on, and over the right of way of this defendant railway corporation, and parallel with its track, unless not to do so would defeat the object and purpose of its grant; because, before there can be a taking such as prayed for by the plaintiff, it must be shown that it is not practical to construct its line between said points in any other way than upon defendant railway company's right of way."

"The action of the trial court in overruling this exception is a material question properly presented in appellant's brief for decision, and the court of civil appeals hereby certifies that question to the supreme court for decision. In other words, stating the question in a different form: Can there be a condemnation of property already devoted to a public use in the manner described in the plaintiff's petition, for the purpose of devoting it to another and a different use in the manner and under the limitations prescribed in the plaintiff's petition, unless it be shown that it is for the public benefit and of a higher order than the purpose for which it is already used, as well as that it cannot be practically constructed in any other way?"

In the case of San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. 93 Tex. 313, 49 L. R. A. 459, 55 S. W. 117, it was held by this court that telephone companies were invested with the same power to condemn property for the construction of their lines as that given by the Revised Statutes to telegraph companies. The extent of that power is the subject presented for consideration by the present certificate. It is granted by articles 698 and 699 of the Revised Statutes as follows:

"Art. 698. Corporations created for the purpose of constructing and maintaining magnetic telegraph lines are authorized to set their poles, piers, abutments, wires, and other fixtures along, upon, and across any of the public roads, streets, and waters of this state, in such manner as not to incommode the public in the use of such road, streets, and waters."

"Art. 699. Such companies are also authorized to enter upon any lands, whether owned by private persons in fee or in any less es- 60 L. R. A.

tate, or by any corporation, whether acquired by purchase or by virtue of any provision in the charter of such corporation, for the purpose of making preliminary surveys and examinations with a view to the erection of any telegraph lines, and from time to time to appropriate so much of said lands as may be necessary to erect such poles, piers, abutments, wires, and other necessary fixtures for a magnetic telegraph, and to make such changes of location of any part of said lines as may from time to time be deemed necessary, and shall have a right of access to construct said line, and, when erected, from time to time as may be required to repair the same, and may proceed to obtain the right of way and to condemn lands for the use of the corporation in the manner provided by law in the case of railway corporations."

The objection urged by appellant to the attempt to condemn a portion of the land previously acquired by it for a right of way is that the property has already been devoted to public use; that the grant of the power of eminent domain in general terms to another corporation does not, upon established principles, include the right to take such property unless it be absolutely necessary to the exercise of the privilege granted; and that, as the statute has not expressly conferred the right of condemnation asserted, the plaintiff must show such absolute necessity, i. e., that its line cannot, in the language of the question certified, "be practically constructed in any other way."

The doctrine of the law upon which this contention is founded is thus very well stated by Justice Brown in Sabine & E. T. R. Co. v. Gulf & I. R. Co. 92 Tex. 162, 166, 168, 46 S. W. 784, 786: "The law [conferring power of condemnation upon railway companies] does not authorize the condemnation of property which has already been dedicated to a public use when such condemnation would practically destroy the use to which it has been devoted. No express authority is given [to railroad companies] by our statutes to condemn such property, and the authority cannot be implied from the general power conferred by the law, unless the necessity be so great as to make the new enterprise of paramount importance to the public, and it cannot be practically accomplished in any other way." The doctrine is further stated on page 168, 92 Tex. and on page 786, 46 S. W.: "The authorities before cited fully sustain the proposition that such property will not be taken in condemnation proceedings when the taking will destroy the use to which it is devoted, unless it be found that the constructing road or the connection sought to be made is of so great importance to the public as to demand that another public use of less importance shall be set aside for its benefit, and that the new enterprise cannot be accomplished in any other practical way. The first occupier of the ground is entitled to all the advantages derived from the establishment of the public use therein, and no question of convenience nor expense to the company seeking condemnation can be considered, unless it be such as to render the performance of the duty enjoined by law practically impossible by any other means which can be used by the constructing company." Obviously, the first question which occurs in the consideration of such cases is whether or not the legislature has expressly conferred the power asserted. The rule of construction laid down in the quotation, and in the authorities generally, is applied in cases where the second use to which the property is sought to be put will destroy, or, at least, materially interfere with, that to which such property has been previously devoted. When this is the situation, courts refuse to hold that the legislature, by a mere general grant of the power to enter upon and condemn land, intended to authorize the destruction or material impairment of an already established public use, unless it appears that the power last conferred can be exercised in no other practical way. In such cases the power is to be implied, and cannot be implied from anything less than practical necessity. But all authority concedes the power of the legislature to authorize the taking of property which has already been condemned to public use, and we must therefore look to the law to see if the power here in question has been conferred.

The power of condemnation granted to telegraph companies is expressed in language both general and specific. The statute authorizes the construction of telegraph lines upon and across public roads, streets, etc., showing that the legislature thought it proper to grant the privilege with respect to some lands already in use by the public. It then authorizes the condemnation of "any lands, whether owned by private persons in fee or in any less estate, or by any corporation, whether acquired by purchase or by virtue of any provision in the charter of such corporation." It is plain that the characters of estates in lands of corporations thus made subject to the power are the same as those of private persons, i. e., "either in fee or in any less estate." It is equally plain that such estates are meant as have been acquired by corporations in any manner whatsoever. All lands owned by corporations in any kind of estate must have been acquired either by "purchase" or "by virtue of some provision in their charters." If lands are acquired "by virtue of any provision in the charter," they are expressly subjected to such proceedings as this. Rights of way of railroad companies acquired by condemnation proceedings are acquired "by virtue" of provisions either of special charters or charters founded upon the general law, and therefore come within the express provision of the statute. If it be said that the power given is only a general one, and cannot, under the rule of condemnation stated, be held to refer to property held by corporations for public purposes, how can we account for the use of this language, at once so comprehensive and so particular? Other provisions of the statute conferring the power of eminent domain upon other kinds of corporations give the right to take any lands of persons or corporations, and some of them give the right to construct works along and across public roads, streets, waters, etc.; but in none of them did the legislature take the pains to use the specific language employed in favor of telegraph companies. Unless it was foreseen that questions as to the extent of the power might arise out of the characters of estates held and the modes of their acquisition, and ought to be settled by the statute, why should the legislature have referred to those incidents at all? We must assume that this language was used for a purpose, and it can best be subserved by giving to the words of the statute their true and legitimate meaning, rather than by frittering them away by construction. The reasons which actuated the legislature are easily conjectured. Telegraph lines were in existence upon rights of way of railway companies throughout the country, and it was common knowledge that they did not impede, but rather facilitated, the business of the carriers. Whatever might be the effect of the construction of great numbers of such lines along railroads, there have not been at any time such conditions existing in this state as to cripple or impede the carrying business, and to call for closer restrictions by legislation upon the rights granted to telegraph companies. So general has been the opinion that telegraph lines can exist upon the rights of way of railroad companies, consistently with the rights of the latter, that Congress in 1866 gave permission for the construction of such lines along the national post roads, some of which are railroads. The legislature acted upon the knowledge of these well-known facts and conditions, and, in granting powers to telegraph companies, employed language materially differing from that used in conferring the right of condemnation upon corporations whose objects required different uses of property employed in their business,—language well chosen to express the power in controversy. Authority to burden such property with another railroad, or a turnpike, or a canal, would involve consequences very different from those flowing from a grant to a telegraph company of authority to maintain its line on the same property, and hence the kinds of estates to be subjected to the power are differently specified in the statute. And, at last, the provisions applicable to telegraph companies, when interpreted as we interpret them, authorized only the doing of that, by authority of law, which was being done every day in various parts of the country either under such authority or by contract. Another evidence that the legislature meant what we hold it to have meant is found in article 700:

"Art. 700. No corporation shall have power to contract with any owner of land for the right to erect and maintain a telegraph line over his lands to the exclusion of the lines of other companies."

The history of the litigation of the country makes it well known to us, as it was doubtless well known to the legislature, that contracts of the character here prohibited were being made between railroad companies and one telegraph company for the exclusive use of rights of way. This was the evil to be prevented by this provision, which presupposes that the legislature intended to confer upon telegraph companies generally the right to use the rights of way of railway companies for the construction of telegraph lines.

Our conclusion does not impute to the legislature a purpose to destroy or impair the use by railway companies of their property for all the purposes for which it is needed, but rather a recognition of the fact that such use will not be interfered with by the legitimate exercise of the privileges granted to telegraph companies. From this conclusion it results that the appellee has the same authority to condemn a right of way over the property in question that it would have to condemn the property of others, and that the mere fact that it could obtain such right of way over other property or in other ways furnishes no defense to the proceeding. The legislature having itself determined and enacted that such a use of the property is one to which it may be applied consistently with the prior use, no question as to the comparative importance of the two uses is left open for the courts to determine. Many such condemnations have been had in this state, and have been sustained by the courts of civil appeals, which are the courts of last resort in such cases. In some of the decisions, the point under consideration has been expressly decided adversely to appellant, and in others it was necessarily involved. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 52 S. W. 107; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 52 S. W. 86; *Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Postal Teleg. We answer that the exception was properly overruled by the trial court. What we have said sufficiently answers the question as otherwise stated.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, NINTH CIRCUIT.

S. A. GIBBS, Plff. in Err.,
v.

(118 Fed. 120.)

A combination of the manufacturers of a product of a state, the market for four fifths of which is found in other states, to limit production and raise the price, is a violation of the anti-trust act of July 2, 1890.

(October 13, 1902.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western Division of the District of Washington to review a judgment in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been inflicted on plaintiff by a fraudulent combination among defendants. Reversed.

Statement by Gilbert, Circuit Judge:

The plaintiff in error brought an action to recover damages against the defendants in error under the act of Congress known as the "Sherman anti-trust act," of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), and alleged in his complaint, as his first cause of action: That for more than ten years he had been a dealer in Washington red-cedar shingles at the city of Tacoma in the state of Washington, conducting a general business in such shingles, purchasing them of the various manufacturers thereof within the state of Washington, and selling them to purchasers in other states of the United States and in certain foreign countries. That his business was valuable; and that he was solely dependent upon it for his livelihood, and that he had acquired a wide clientage, and had transacted a business amounting to $100,000 a year, and had derived an annual profit therefrom of $3,000; that the said Washington red-cedar shingle is solely manufactured in the state of Washington, and has become an article of prime necessity and indispensable use to the people in the various states and countries named; and alleged that, during the first ten months of the year 1899, 4,000,000,000 shingles were manufactured, of which 3,300,500,000 were manufactured for the purpose of selling and delivering to purchasers outside the state of Washington, and were so sold and delivered. That the defendant the Washington Red-Cedar Shingle Manufacturers' Association was a voluntary association of the various manufacturers and dealers in said shingles in the state of Washington, comprising a total of 108; that the association has a constitution and by-laws; that membership is secured by paying a certain initiation fee graded according to the number and character of shingle machines in use by the applicant for membership; that its officers are president, vice president, secretary, treasurer, and a central committee; that the defendants specifically named in the complaint are respectively such officers; that the powers of the committee were to hold meetings "and issue, from time to time, a minimum price below which all members agree not to sell shingles to dealers or wholesalers," "to establish a system of prices at which shingles must be sold to retail dealers," etc., "to order the closing down of all mills, and to take other necessary steps to curtail the output of Washington red-cedar shingles, when in their judgment the supply should exceed the demand." For a second cause of action, the plaintiff in error alleged, in addition to the facts above set forth, that on or about August 15, 1899, the central committee adopted a schedule of prices for shingles, whereby the members of said association were required to and bound themselves to sell at the price so fixed, to wit: Extra A, $1.35 per 1,000, clears, $1.50 per 1,000, which price the plaintiff alleged was above the market price; the market price then being extra A, $1.20 per 1,000, and clears, $1.35 per 1,000. That by reason of the said increase in prices the plaintiff was unable to carry on his business and supply the natural and ordinary demand for such shingles, or to purchase shingles at any other than the price so fixed, and he was injured thereby in his business in the sum of $1,200. For a third cause of action, the plaintiff, in addition to the facts above alleged, set forth that on November 11, 1899, for the purpose of further increasing the price of said shingles, the association ordered its mills to close down for the period of sixty days, which order was obeyed, whereby the trade in shingles was interrupted, and he was unable to purchase shingles with which to fill his orders, to his damage in the sum of $1,000. For a fourth cause of action, in addition to the facts already set forth, the plaintiff alleged that the president, vice president, treasurer, and secretary, together with the central committee, for the purpose of destroying the plaintiff's business published resolutions adopted at a meeting of the central committee, charging the plaintiff with endeavoring to injure the market for Washington red-cedar shingles, and with having no money invested in his business, and as being without credit and irresponsible, and not an honorable and legitimate dealer in such shingles, and that, for the purpose of inducing all wholesale and retail dealers in shingles in the states and foreign countries aforesaid to refuse to buy shingles of the plaintiff, and to induce the manufacturers of shingles to refuse to sell him shingles, they printed and circulated through the mails the said resolutions, and published them in newspapers. And the plaintiff in error set forth in the complaint the names of 253 persons to whom such circulars were sent. He alleged that the result of the conspiracy was to destroy his business, to his damage in the sum of $15,000. On February 2, 1900, the defendants in the action, by their attorneys, filed a general appearance with the clerk on behalf of all the defendants named in the complaint. The defendants McNeeley and Beckman subsequently appeared separately, and demurred to each cause of action in the complaint for want of jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants, want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, defect of parties defendant, and the insufficiency of the facts pleaded to constitute causes of action. Upon the last of these grounds of demurrer, the cause was presented in the circuit court before Hanford, District Judge, and the demurrer was sustained as to all except the fourth cause of action. 102 Fed. 594. Upon that cause the case afterward went to trial before Bellinger, District Judge, who directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendants in error upon the ground that the proofs did not sustain the causes of action, and that the combination described in the complaint is not one in restraint of interstate commerce, so as to give a right of action, under the provisions of the act of July 2, 1890 (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200), to one who has been injured by a resolution, passed and circulated, denouncing him for cutting prices, and also upon the ground that in the opinion of the court the allegations in the fourth cause of action were insufficient to constitute a cause of action. 107 Fed. 210.

tempt to create a monopoly. Anyone can enter the business of manufacturing and selling shingles under fully as favorable conditions as if no such association existed.

The maintenance of prices has been the salvation of the owners of mills, small and large. And the maintenance of prices is the principal aim of the association.

United States v. Greenhut, 50 Fed. 469; United States v. Hopkins, 82 Fed. 529, 171 U. S. 599, 43 L. ed. 298, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40.

Gilbert, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The case having gone to trial before a jury on the fourth cause of action, and having been determined adversely to the plaintiff in error on the facts, and it being conceded that the demurrer to the first cause of action was properly sustained, the question which is here presented is whether the facts alleged in either the second or the third cause of action in the complaint constitute a cause of action under the act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the "Sherman anti-trust act" (26 Stat. at L. 209, chap. 647, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3200). The combination which is described in the complaint consists of a combination of manufacturers and wholesale dealers in Washington red-cedar shingles, who reside and carry on their business within the state of Washington, and sell and deliver goods to residents of other states. It is not charged that the defendants in error, or any of them, have entered into any combination or contract with residents of other states. The alleged right of the plaintiff in error to recover is based substantially upon the fact that the combination comprises all the manufacturers and wholesale dealers within the state of Washington, and that they have combined and conspired together to fix an arbitrary price to wholesale and retail dealers for an article of merchandise used in interstate commerce, below which no one is permitted to buy or to sell, and that the price so fixed marks a distinct increase of the market price as it had stood theretofore, and that the association has assumed and exercised, and will continue to exercise, the power to shut down all mills within the state at will, and for so long a time as it may deem necessary. Is this a combination in restraint of interstate commerce, such as is denounced by the statute? There can be no doubt that at common law it is an unlawful combination in restraint of trade. It has the effect to diminish production, abolish competition, and enhance prices. Its illegality is not relieved by the fact that it was induced by the keen competition and the unprofitable condition of the shingle manufacturing business which existed before it was entered into, or by the fact that the prices fixed by the combination may have been reasonable. American Biscuit & Mfg Co. v. Klotz, 44 Fed. 721; Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457, 43 N. W. 1102; State ex rel. Watson v. Standard Oil Co. 49 Ohio St. 137, 15 L. R. A. 145, 30 N. E. 279; People v. Milk Exchange, 145 N. Y. 267, 27 L. R. A. 437, 39 N. 60 L. R. A.

E. 1062; National Harrow Co. v. Hench, 39 L. R. A. 299, 27 C. C. A. 349, 55 U. S. App. 53, 83 Fed. 36; Cravens v. Carter-Crume Co. 34 C. C. A. 479, 92 Fed. 479.

The anti-trust act goes as far, if not farther, than the common law, and declares unlawful all combinations in restraint of interstate trade. In order, therefore, to bring the combination which is under consideration within the interdiction of the act, it must appear that it is more than a mere combination in restraint of trade; it must involve the restraint of interstate or international commerce. It is urged by the defendants in error that merchandise is not subject to the power of Congress to regulate commerce until it is in actual transit from one state to another, and that matters occurring prior to the commencement of this final movement are not matters of interstate commerce, but are within the authority of the state, and are wholly unaffected by other authority. Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 475; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; and other cases are cited in support of that view. But in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 497, 30 L. ed. 697, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 596, it was said: "The negotiation of sales of goods which are in another state, for the purpose of introducing them into the state in which the negotiation is made, is interstate commerce;" and the case of Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. v. United States, 175 U. S. 211, 44 L. ed. 136, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 96, is authority for the proposition that the power of Congress to regulate commerce is not confined to goods that have begun their movement out of the state in which they are manufactured, but that it extends to negotiations and contracts made preliminary to the manufacture, sale, and shipment of goods in interstate commerce. The court in that case had under consideration a combination between manufacturers located in different states. The combination comprised six corporations, and it was entered into for the purpose of raising prices of steel pipe in certain designated states. Their method of business required the delivery of pipe by the seller at the place where it was to be used by the buyer, and included in the price the cost of delivery. By the terms of the combination, contracts were to be made, after public letting, at the home and in the state of the buyer. Requests for bids were to be submitted to a central committee, which was to fix a price, and the contract was to be awarded to that member of the combination who would agree to pay, for the benefit of the other members, the largest bonus. This was the method of business except in certain designated reserved states, in which the successful bidder was to be designated, and the price and bonus were to be fixed by the association. The agreement of the association restrained every defendant, except the one selected to receive the contract, from making a contract for pipe with the intended purchaser. With respect to the sales in the states in which the mills of the defendant were situated, the effect of the agreement was to bind at least three, if not more, of the defendants to make no contract at all in those states for the sale and delivery of pipe in another state. In short, the agreement had the effect to restrain at least three, sometimes four, sometimes five, and sometimes all, of the defendants in interstate trade, which otherwise they would have been permitted to engage in, in selling in one state pipe to be delivered from another state at prices to be determined upon from competition and at market rates. There were other restrictions in the combination, not necessary here to be further specified. The court held that the association was a contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade, as the terms are understood in the act, and that the subject-matter of the restraint was not articles of merchandise or their manufacture, but contracts for the sale of such articles to be delivered across state lines, and the negotiations and bids preliminary to the making of such contracts; all of which are interstate commerce. The court said: "If, therefore, an agreement or combination directly restrains, not alone the manufacture, but the purchase, sale, or exchange of the manufactured commodity among the several states, it is brought within the provisions of the statute."

The defendants in error rely upon the case of United States v. E. O. Knight Co. 156 U. S. 1, 39 L. ed. 325, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 249. That case arose upon a bill in equity filed by the United States under the anti-trust act to enjoin the defendants from continuing a combination which comprised substantially all the sugar refineries of the country for refining raw sugar. The bill alleged that the American Sugar-Refining Company had purchased the stock of four other sugar-refining companies with shares of its own, and that thereby it acquired almost the complete control of the manufacture of refined sugar in the United States. It was the object of the suit to cancel the agreements of purchase, to cause the redelivery of the stock to the former owners thereof, and to enjoin the further performance of the agreement. The court denied the relief which was prayed for, and held that the combination was not within the prohibition of the statute for the reason that the agreement related only to the manufacture of refined sugar, and not to its sale. The chief justice, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Commerce succeeds to manufacture, and is not a part of it. The power to regulate commerce is the power to prescribe the rule by which commerce shall be governed, and is a power independent of the power to suppress monopoly. But it may operate in repression of monopoly whenever that comes within the rules by which commerce is governed, or whenever the transaction is itself a monopoly of commerce. . . . The fact that an article is manufactured for export to another state does not of itself make it an article of interstate commerce, and the intent of the manufacturer does not determine the time when the article or product passes from the 60 L. R. A.

control of the state, and belongs to commerce." The chief justice proceeded to say, further: "What the law struck at was combinations, contracts, and conspiracies to monopolize trade and commerce among the several states or with foreign nations, but the contracts and acts of the defendants related exclusively to the acquisition of the Philadelphia refineries and the business of sugar refining in Pennsylvania, and bore no direct relation to commerce between the states or with foreign nations. The object was manifestly private gain in the manufacture of the commodity, but not through the control of interstate or foreign commerce. . . . There was nothing in the proofs to indicate any intention to put a restraint upon trade or commerce, and the fact, as we have seen, that trade or commerce might be indirectly affected, was not enough to entitle complainants to a decree."

The purport of this language of the court is to mark a distinction between a restraint upon manufacturing and a restraint upon interstate commerce in a manufactured article, and to hold that the power of Congress to regulate commerce extends only to the latter. If the defendants in that case had combined for the purpose of not only regulating the manufacture of refined sugar, but the price at which it should be furnished to purchasers in other states, a different case might have been presented. There was nothing in the case as it was presented to show that the combination contemplated a regulation of prices of merchandise which was to enter into interstate commerce, or a restraint of the trade in merchandise in such commerce. There was before the court only a combination to manufacture, which might or might not result in an increase of prices, and the court held, therefore, that commerce was only indirectly affected. Mr. Justice Peckham, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. Case, said: "It is the sale and delivery of a certain kind and quality of pipe, and not the manufacture, which is the material portion of the contract, and a sale for delivery beyond the state makes the transaction a part of interstate commerce;" and, distinguishing that case from the E. O. Knight Co. Case, said, of the combination in the latter case, that its direct purpose was the control of the manufacture of sugar; and added: "There was no combination or agreement in terms regarding the future disposition of the manufactured article,—nothing looking to a transaction in the nature of interstate commerce."

In these words the court marked the limit of the doctrine of the E. O. Knight Co. Case. The plain intimation from the language of the court is that, if there had been in that case a combination or agreement in terms regarding the future disposition of the manufactured article across state lines, there would have been added the essential element to make it a combination affecting interstate commerce.

The ground upon which the court held that the combination of manufacturers in the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. Case restrained interstate commerce was the fact that it was made in contemplation of the transaction of future business between citizens of different states and the negotiation of sales, to be made in one state, of goods to be delivered therein from another. While there was in that case no particular contract for furnishing pipe or fixing its price in the contemplation of the parties to the combination at the time when it was made, the court referred to the fact that it was the purpose of the combination to abolish all competition, and said: "The direct and immediate result of the combination was, therefore, necessarily a restraint upon interstate commerce in respect of articles manufactured by any of the parties to it, to be transported beyond the state in which they were made."

The present case differs in important aspects from both the E. C. Knight Co. Case and the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. Case. It occupies a ground intermediate between. The combination which it presents is more than a mere combination to manufacture, such as was before the court in the E. C. Knight Co. Case, and it lacks some of the features of the Addyston Pipe & Steel Co. Case, in that it contains no express provision for the transaction of business across state lines; it does not by its terms refer to the sale or delivery of shingles elsewhere than in the state of Washington. But can it be said that such sales and delivery were not within its contemplation, and are not directly affected by it? The defendants in error were engaged in manufacturing a product of which, as they well knew, more than 80 per cent was to be sold, delivered, and used in states other than that of its manufacture. They were in the business of selling and delivering shingles to purchasers in other states. In fixing a list of prices they fixed it, not alone for domestic trade, but for external commerce as well. The inevitable result of the combination is to enhance the price and restrain the trade of shingles in all the states. In the E. C. Knight Co. Case it was held that a monopoly to manufacture did not necessarily affect interstate commerce. The reason for so holding is apparent. From the creation of a monopoly to manufacture, it does not necessarily follow that interstate commerce in the monopolized article will in any degree be interfered with. The total production of the manufactured article and its price may, notwithstanding the monopoly, remain unaffected. In that case it was said: "There was nothing in the proofs to indicate any intention to put a restraint upon trade or commerce." But this cannot be said of a combination of manufacturers in one state who agree to arbitrarily increase the price and diminish the total output of a manufactured product which is made only in that state, but which is principally bought and used in other states. The intention to put a restraint upon interstate-commerce in such a case is evident, and the restraint is not indirect, but direct, and it is the necessary and inevitable result of the combination.

We do not think that the act contemplates that the combination therein made unlawful must be one which shall by its terms refer to interstate commerce. It is enough if its purpose and effect are necessarily to restrain interstate trade. If it were otherwise, all combinations in restraint of interstate trade might be so expressed in words as to avoid the statute. The true test would seem to be, not what the agreement professes, but what it accomplishes. This combination must be dealt with in view of the known facts which surrounded it when it was formed, and which still attend it. It is impossible that the parties to it had in view only domestic trade. They must have had in contemplation the market which they had theretofore had, and which they would continue to have, and which, as they well knew, was principally without the limits of their own state. It is immaterial that all the parties to the agreement were residents of the same state. It is not the place where the parties reside that distinguishes the combination, and lends to it the features of a combination in restraint of interstate trade. A case in point is Chesapeake & O. Fuel Co. v. United States, 53 C. C. A. 256, 115 Fed. 610, recently decided by the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, in which the court held illegal under the anti-trust law, both as in restraint of interstate commerce and as tending to create a monopoly, a combination between a fuel company, a corporation of the state of West Virginia, and 14 corporations, persons, and firms of that state, who were independently engaged in producing coal and coke in a district on the line of a railroad. The combination stipulated that the company was to handle for a term of years the entire output of the members of the association, which was to be shipped to the western market over said road, and that it should sell the product of no competing mines, and it provided that a minimum price for the sale of the coal and coke should be fixed from time to time by a committee of the association, which price the fuel company agreed to pay, and in addition thereto agreed to obtain as large a profit as possible, and to account to the association for all thereof above a fixed sum per ton, which it was to retain as its compensation. We have not overlooked certain expressions of the court in the E. C. Knight Co. Case, where it was said that Congress did not attempt, by the act of July 2, 1890, "to limit and restrict the rights of corporations created by the states, or the citizens of the states, in the acquisition, control, or disposition of property, or to regulate or prescribe the price or prices at which such property or the products thereof should be sold;" and where it was further said that contracts "to raise or lower prices or wages might unquestionably tend to restrain external as well as domestic trade, but the restraint would be an indirect result, however inevitable and whatever its extent, and such result would not necessarily determine the object of the contract, combination, or conspiracy." We think the court, in using this language, had in view combinations to raise prices which might be made without special reference to interstate trade, and which would only indirectly affect it. The combination in the case before the court is more than a combination to regulate prices; it is a combination to control the production of a manufactured article more than four fifths of which is made for interstate trade, and to diminish competition in its production, as well as to advance its price. These features, we think, determine its object, and bring it under the condemnation of the law. The plaintiff in error is in the business of buying the manufactured article in the state where it is manufactured, and selling it to purchasers in other states. The acts charged against the defendants in error interfere with his "contracts to buy, sell, or exchange goods to be transported among the several states,"—contracts which are made and negotiated between the plaintiff in error and his customers in various states,—and the acts of the defendants are in restraint of the interstate commerce in which he is engaged. We think the complaint states a cause of action. We find no error in the ruling of the circuit court in denying the motion of the plaintiff in error for an order granting the default of all the defendants in error except E. J. McNeeley and Victor H. Beckman, and granting Bates & Murray leave to withdraw their general appearance entered on behalf of all of the defendants in error, and to so amend the same as to make said appearance for and on behalf of McNeeley and Beckman only.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the foregoing views.

Petition for rehearing denied.

v.

CHICAGO & NORTHWESTERN RAIL-WAY COMPANY, Respt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. A railroad company is liable for the act of its engineer, in whose custody it has placed signal torpedoes, in placing one on the track, in dangerous proximity to bystanders, and moving the engine over it for his own amusement, in consequence of which one of the bystanders is injured.
2. Moving an engine forward to pull a car onto the track, with knowledge that a torpedo lies on the track in front of the engine, the explosion of which will be dangerous to bystanders, is negligence on the part of the engineer, and the railroad company is liable for injuries resulting therefrom.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Kenosha County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Winslow, J.:

This is an action for personal injuries. Many of the facts are undisputed. It appears that in May, 1899, the defendant company constructed a temporary spur track along one of the streets of the city of Kenosha running into a public park in that city (in which a library building was being constructed) for the purpose of delivering materials for the construction of the building; that the track was not fenced; that on the morning of July 6, 1899, a switch engine operated by an engineer and fireman ran over said track into the park for the purpose of pulling a freight car, which had run off the end of the track, back upon the track; that the engine was attached to the car, and made several attempts to pull it; that some boys were standing in the park nearby, watching the operation, and that a delayed celebration of the Fourth of July was going on; that the plaintiff was one of the boys thus watching, and that he was about nine years of age; that either the fireman or the engineer descended from the cab of the engine, and placed a railroad torpedo on the track about a foot from one of the driving wheels; that the man who placed the torpedo on the track immediately got into the cab again, and the engine was moved over the torpedo, exploding it; and that a flying piece of metal therefrom buried itself in plaintiff's leg, inflicting a serious injury; and that the plaintiff did not know what it was that the man put upon the track. The engineer testified that he did not place the torpedo on the track, and did not know it was there, and the fireman testified that he placed the torpedo on the track for his own amusement, and that the engineer did not direct him to do so, nor know that it was done. On the other hand, testimony was given tending to show that the engineer himself placed the torpedo on the track. At the close of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and from judgment thereon the plaintiff appeals.

Messrs. Baker & Baker, for appellant:
The question whether the servant acted within the scope of his employment is one for the jury.

And the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the servant was not acting in the course of his employment.

It is immaterial whether the employee disregarded or violated any direction, instruction, regulation, or customs of defendant.

If the employees of defendant used its torpedoes and engine while intrusted to them for use in its business for their amusement by negligently running the engine over the torpedoes, causing injury, the defendant would be liable, because it has been negligent in the performance of its duty to guard and safely keep such dangerous appliances.

Mr. Edward M. Hyzer, for respondent:

The master is liable for the negligent acts of his servant within the scope of the latter's employment. If the servant steps aside, however, from his master's business, even though but temporarily, to do some act outside the business of his master, the relation of master and servant during such time is suspended; and, whatever the latter does during such time, the consequences are not chargeable to the former.

Winslow, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent's contention (which seems to have been adopted by the trial court) is, in brief, that the uncontradicted evidence shows that there was no occasion for the use of the torpedo in the transaction of the defendant's business; that it was placed in the care of the engineer, and the fireman had no authority to take it; that the fireman took it without the knowledge of the engineer, and placed it upon the track for his own amusement; that in so doing he was entirely outside the scope of his employment; and hence, that his principal is not responsible for the results of his act. If this contention were fully justified by the facts, it is difficult to see how the conclusion could be avoided. We agree with counsel that the evidence shows that there was no occasion for the use of the torpedo at this time in the transaction of the defendant's business. It is clear that, under the rules of the company, it was only to be used as a signal, to be put on the track when it was desired to stop an approaching train. We also agree that the evidence shows that it was placed in the care of the engineer, and that the fireman had no right to use it, or authority to take it from the engine, save as directed by the engineer. We cannot, however, admit that the uncontradicted evidence proves that the fireman placed the torpedo on the track without the authority or knowledge of the engineer. It is true that the fireman testifies to this effect, and that the engineer denies that he put the torpedo on the track, or knew of its being placed there, but there is evidence on the part of the plaintiff tending directly to show that the engineer himself placed the torpedo on the track. The nature of the evidence was as follows: The plaintiff and his two companions testified that a man jumped from the cab, placed something on the track, the character of which they did not know, and climbed back into the cab, pulled the lever, and started the engine, when the explosion took place. The engineer testified that the fireman did nothing about the operation of the engine, but that he himself pulled the throttle, and started it. Again, the plaintiff at the trial identified the engineer (both fireman and engineer standing before him) as the man who put the torpedo on the track. We regard this evidence as amply sufficient to carry the question to the jury. So, in considering the motion to direct a verdict, it must be taken as though it were proved that the engineer placed the torpedo on the rail, and moved the engine over it, causing the explosion; and the question is whether a verdict against the defendant could be sustained upon this state of facts. That railroad torpedoes are, in their nature, dangerous agencies, cannot be doubted. It is common knowledge that they are loaded with some high explosive, and with a sufficient amount thereof to cause a loud explosion; and the danger which exists, even in the explosion of toy torpedoes, is too well understood to admit of doubt that railroad torpedoes should be considered as dangerous agencies as matter of law. So the situation to be considered upon the motion is this: The defendant placed these dangerous explosives in the custody of its servant, to be placed on the track in certain contingencies as a warning to approaching trains. The servant, however, placed one on the track when not contemplated by the employer, evidently for his own amusement, and in dangerous proximity to third persons, and moved the engine over it, causing it to explode, and inflict injury on one of such persons; and the question is whether a verdict for the injured person against the principal can be sustained under such circumstances. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. The principle that a master is not responsible for the torts of his servant when the servant has departed from his employment is well understood. If this principle were as easy for application as it is of statement, we should have little difficulty; but, like many another simple and plain principle, its application to construe facts is sometimes very difficult. The question, generally, is whether the servant has departed from his employment, or whether he has departed from or neglected a duty in the line of that employment. In the first case the principal is not responsible for his acts, and in the second case he is. Applying the principle to the present case, supposing that the jury had found that the engineer placed the torpedo on the track, it seems quite plain that a verdict for the plaintiff might be sustained. The engineer's duty was to operate the engine; to take care of the torpedoes, and see that they were used only at proper times and places. The company had placed in his charge these dangerous agencies, and authorized him to use them at proper times. In placing one of them upon the track as he did, he was doing what the company had directly authorized him to do; but he was not doing it at the time or place authorized by the master. He was not beyond the scope of his employment, but he was wilfully or wantonly violating a duty resulting from his employment, namely, his duty to safely keep and properly use the torpedoes. There have been many cases involving the application of this principle, and they cannot be said to be entirely harmonious; but the principle above stated is believed to be substantiated by the great weight of authority. The doctrine is quite well stated in Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. 60 L. R. A.

v. Shields, 47 Ohio St. 387, 8 L. R. A. 464, 24 N. E. 658, as follows: "A servant may depart from his employment without making his master liable for his negligence when outside the employment of the master, and he so departs whenever he goes beyond the scope of his employment and engages in affairs of his own. But he cannot depart from the duty intrusted to him, when that duty regards the rights of others in respect to the employment of dangerous instruments by the master in the prosecution of his business, without making the master liable for the consequences; for the first step in that direction is a breach of the duty intrusted to him by the master, and his negligence in this regard becomes at once the negligence of the master." The cases upon this subject will be found quite fully cited in the case of Alsever v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 115 Iowa, 338, 56 L. R. A. 748, 88 N. W. 841. This was a case where an engineer blew off steam from a blow-off cock solely for the purpose of frightening some children, and one of the children, by reason of her fright, fell, and broke her leg, and it was held that a verdict for the plaintiff could be sustained under the principles herein stated.

There is, however, another view which may be taken of the case as made by the plaintiff's evidence, which also leads to the conclusion that it was a proper case for the jury to pass upon. If it be true, as the evidence tends to show, that the engineer placed the torpedo on the track, then he knew that a dangerous explosive was on the track immediately in front of the driving wheel at the moment he moved the engine, and that third persons were in close proximity. If, under such circumstances, and with that knowledge, he moved his engine in the attempt to pull the car upon the track, the master would unquestionably be liable for injuries to such third persons which were proximately caused by the engineer's negligent act. Upon the plainest principles, the engineer could not, in prosecuting his master's business, move his engine over an obstacle or dangerous place upon the track which was known to him, when such movement was plainly imminently dangerous to third persons, without rendering his master liable for the proximate result of his negligent act. These views necessitate reversal of the judgment.

Judgment reversed, and action remanded for a new trial.

BOARD OF COUNTY COMMISSIONERS OF POLK COUNTY.

(.....Minn.....)

*1. In cases of imperfectly drawn statutes, the court, rather than pronounce them unconstitutional and void, will draw inferences from the evident intent of the legislature, as gathered from the whole statute, supplying by implication technical inaccuracies in expression and obviously unintentional omissions, from the necessity of making them operative and effectual as to specific things which are included in the broad and comprehensive terms and purposes thereof; and such inferences and implications are as much a part of the statute as what is distinctly expressed therein.

2. Chapter 258, Gen. Laws 1901,—an act providing for the drainage of wet and overflowed lands in certain cases,—construed, and held a valid, constitutional legislative enactment.

3. A petition in proper form, filed as required by the above statute, is a jurisdictional prerequisite to the authority of the county commissioners to entertain a proceeding thereunder; but the description of a proposed ditch need not be stated with precise accuracy. It is sufficient that the starting point, course, and terminus be stated with approximate accuracy; the board, in ordering the construction of a ditch under such statute, being finally guided by the description as contained in the surveyor's report.

I. General observations as to right to establish.

It being settled with very little protest that drainage is one of the things which come legitimately within the powers of the government, and that the power and duty to provide drainage may be conferred and imposed upon municipal corporations and other local subdivisions of the state (see note on Liability of municipality for drainage, post, —), and it being settled, also, that drainage is a public purpose for which PETITION for a writ of certiorari to review proceedings laying out a drain. Writ discharged.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gideon S. Ives and Harvey W. Stark, for petitioners:

The legislature has no power to exercise the right of eminent domain, the police power, or the power of taxation for private purposes.

2 Kent, Com. p. 424; Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 63, 82 N. W. 1094; Re Jacobs, 93 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636; Re Theresa Drainage Dist. 90 Wis. 301, 63 N. W. 288.

The courts have invariably held such an act, either in violation (by inference) of the rule that private property cannot be taken for a public use, etc., or of the Bill of Rights, which provides that no citizen shall be deprived of his rights unless by the law of the land, etc.

Coster v. Tide Water Co. 18 N. J. Eq. 54; Lewis, Em. Dom. § 157.

The drainage of lands does not ordinarily constitute a public purpose, so as to bring the same within the principles of eminent domain, police power, or the power of taxation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 532; Donnelly v. Decker, 58 Wis. 461, 46 Am. Rep. 637, 17 N. W. 389; Re Theresa Drainage Dist. 90 Wis. 301, 63 N. W. 288; Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 23, 57 N. E. 1009; Hull v. Baird, 73 Iowa, 528, 35 N. W. 615; Kinnie v. Bare, 68 Mich. 625, 36 N. W. 672.

Nor does the taking of lands for purposes of this character under former laws afford any precedents upon which a public purpose the power of eminent domain may be exercised (see note to Re Tuthill [N. Y.] 49 L. R. A. 781); and that the expense of it may be met by taxation, general or local (see note to Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties [Ill.] 58 L. R. A. 353).—It becomes a very important question to the person whose property is to be taken for a right of way, to the person who is to be charged with the expense, and to the public, what procedure is necessary to acquire the right of way, and to charge the taxpayer with the expense. In general, the procedure is prescribed by statute, and the decisions will not be sufficient to indicate fully what must be done. But frequently the statute needs harmonizing with the Constitution, and needs supplementing where constitutional rights are not protected. Furthermore, while the statutory plan is to be followed, certain steps are regarded as essential, so that without them the proceedings will be of no avail; while others are merely directory, and may be dispensed with and the taxpayer is still held liable. The local statutes cannot be set out or harmonized, but one proceeding with a statute before him may be shown what the courts have said with reference to the steps indicated by the statute.

A reference to the note in 49 L. R. A. 781, will show that, to enlist the powers of government in a drainage enterprise, the purpose of it must be for the public good. The prerogative powers of eminent domain and taxation cannot be invoked for a private purpose. In elaboration of that principle, attention is called to the following case:

In the case of the Isle of Ely, 10 Coke, 141a, involving the powers of commissioners of sewers, it was said that, by the common law, before the statute of 6 Hen. VI. chap. 5, creating the commissioners of sewers, the King ought, of right, to save and defend his realm as well against the sea as against the enemy,—that it should not be drowned or wasted; and also provided that his subjects have free passage through the realm by bridges and highways in safety; and therefore, if the sea walls be broken, or the sewers or gutters are not scoured, that the fresh waters cannot have a direct course, the King ought to grant a commission to inquire into and hear and determine these defaults. That at common law the ancient walls, gutters, and sewers might be repaired or new made, but no new walls, gutters, or sewers by force of the said commission might be made. The same power, and no greater power, was given to commissioners of sewers. No one could be taxed by the commissioners of sewers for the reparation of a sea wall or sewer but those who had prejudice, damage, or disadvantage by such nuisance or defaults, and who might have benefit and profit by the reformation or removing of them. The tax ought to be of the quantity of lands, tenements, and rents, and by the number of acres and perches. The commissioners of sewers cannot levy a tax in gross upon a town, but it must be particular, according to the express words, upon every owner or possessor of land, tenements, rents, etc.

The courts of Massachusetts have elaborated a theory of drainage which is somewhat different from the generally received ideas upon the subject. That theory has been stated as follows:

The statutes for the improvement of meadows are sometimes ascribed to the right of eminent domain. But there is no taking for public use. It is a proceeding of a semi-judicial nature in which all those whose lands are to be affected are joined as parties. The action taken therein relates to that in which all have a common interest, or in reference to which all are affected by a common necessity. That common necessity is met, and that common interest secured, by subjecting the individuals' rights to such modification as the authorities may judge to be most practicable to secure the best advantage of all. This is under the general principle that the particular right of the individual must yield to a greater right, in the same degree, of the whole. There is no exercise of the right of eminent domain, or of governmental power of taxation. Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 454, 15 Am. Rep. 39.

This theory upholds drainage proceedings which are not for the general public good. It is usually considered unwise for the government to interfere in private affairs unless it has some interest in so doing. The idea usually held of drainage proceedings is that they are in the nature of public improvements and that they are merely an exercise of the police and taxing powers.

What is a drain.

The meaning of the words used in connection with drainage proceedings has undergone some slight change in the course of years. Callis says: A sewer is a common public stream, and a gutter is a straight, private running water. The use of a sewer is common.

In a Rhode Island case it is said: Formerly the word "sewer" was used for "a fresh-water trench, compassed in on both sides with a bank; a small current or little river. So, the statute 25 Hen. VIII. chap. 5, Concerning Commissioners of Sewers, was to remedy damage from may be predicated, for the reason that in all such acts the public purpose must be specifically found before the drain can be established.

Minn. Laws 1883, chap. 108; Minn. Laws 1887, chap. 97.

The power to take private property for public use, which resides in the legislature, must be clearly set forth in the act conferring such authority.

People ex rel. Herrick v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 598.

If there is no declaration by the legislature of the public purpose or use, and no authority delegated to the commissioners to pass upon this question, the act must necessarily be unconstitutional and void.

Elliott, Roads & Streets, p. 148; Dill, Mun. Corp. § 468; Cooley, Const. Law, 530; Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333; Re

the "flowing surges and course of the sea in and upon marsh grounds;" also land waters and springs upon meadows, and other watercourses. More recently, however, and probably from the appropriation of the word, in acts and ordinances, to the common conduits of liquid filth, it is usually associated with such a use. Thus, Webster defines "sewers:" "A drain or passage to convey off water and filth underground." For "drain" he gives: "A watercourse; a sewer." Kent speaks of the right of drainage (3 Com. *436) as a "right to convey water in pipes through or over the estate of another." In Goldthwait v. East Bridgewater, 5 Gray, 61, 64, the court says: "The words 'ditch' and 'drain' have no technical or exact meaning. They both may mean a hollow space in the ground, natural or artificial, where water is collected or passes off." So in Queen v. Godmanchester Local Bd. of Health, 5 Quest & S. 886, 34 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 13, 11 Jur. N. S. 63, 13 Week. Rep. 155, a distinction is made between a drain and a sewer, but the distinction is based upon a statute. Wetmore v. Fiske, 15 R. I. 354, 5 Atl. 375, 10 Atl. 627, 629.

So, the statute of 23 Hen. VIII., which was passed for reclamation of marsh lands, and which provided for a system of drainage, did not provide for a system of sewers in the modern sense in which the word "sewers" is used. Bishop v. Tripp, 16 R. I. 198, 14 Atl. 79.

Sewers are closed or covered waterways, and ditches are drains which are or may be open and so arranged as to take surface water. State ex rel. State Bd. of Health v. Jersey City, 55 N. J. Eq. 116, 35 Atl. 835.

But the word "drain," as used in a general law authorizing a municipal corporation to construct local improvements, is broad enough to include sewers. Charleston v. Johnston, 170 Ill. 336, 48 N. E. 985.

Origin of drainage.

Commission of sewers to defend the Kingdom against the sea is very ancient, and even by special prescription in some cases; but sewers for amelioration of land are by act of Parliament. Shandrigamy v. Sholedam, 12 Mod. 331, Holt, 643.

The commission of sewers was created by statute of Hen. VI. chap. 5. Rooke's Case, 5 Coke, 100.

E. 303; Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1094.

It would make no difference with the question of the constitutionality of this law if the commissioners should find in each case that the taking would conduce to the public sioners to construct and have charge of extensive systems of drainage, conferring upon them the necessary powers, and subjecting them to certain duties,—was never in force in Rhode Island, as it was inapplicable to the situation of that state. Bishop v. Tripp, 16 R. I. 198, 14 Atl. 79.

Power to drain.

The police power of a state, so far as it relates to the public health, includes the making of sewers and drains for the removal of garbage and filth. Wilson v. Sanitary Dist. 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 203.

It is in the power of the state to require local improvements to be made which are essential to the health and prosperity of the community within its borders, such as the construction of canals for the drainage of marshy and malarious districts, and of levees to prevent inundations. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663.

But the only ground upon which the right of eminent domain can be exercised in constructing a ditch over the lands of others is that of public utility. Anderson v. Baker, 98 Ind. 587.

Public health, convenience, or welfare, the conduciveness to which of a drain is essential to its establishment, mean the effect upon the people of the neighborhood or the vicinity of the proposed ditch, in contrast to private rights or benefits of the individual,—that which relates to the many in contradistinction to the few. Thomas v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 449.

Gen. Laws 1901, chap. 258, providing for the drainage of wet and overflowed lands, is constitutional, being an act operating beneficially to the public, and provision being made for the consideration in each particular case, by the board of county commissioners, of the necessity of the improvement, and ample opportunity being afforded for parties interested to appear and raise objections. STATE ex rel. UTICK v. POLK COUNTY.

So, the Indiana ditching law is constitutional and valid. Tinder v. Duck Pond Ditching Asso. 38 Ind. 555.

And is not void as violating the provisions in the Bill of Rights and the Federal Constitution forbidding the taking of private property without due process of law. Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. North, 103 Ind. 486, 3 N. E. 144.

The Michigan drain law of 1885, chap. 227, is not in violation of the state Constitution, art. 14, § 9, providing that the state shall not engage in works of internal improvement. Gillett v. McLaughlin, 69 Mich. 547, 87 N. W. 551.

health, or that it would drain wet or overflowed lands.

Fleming v. Hull, 73 Iowa, 598, 35 N. W. 673.

The petition does not contain a description of the point of commencement of the ditch, nor is the route sufficiently described to comply with the provisions of the statute; and, therefore, all subsequent proceedings under such petition were absolutely void.

Lewis, Em. Dom. § 352.

Mr. W. E. Rowe, for respondent:

The fact that the law requires the petition to specify the public use, and imposes upon the commissioners the duty of making a determination as to its existence as a matter of fact, is all that is required of any drainage law.

Re Theresa Drainage Dist. 90 Wis. 301, 63 N. W. 288.

The drainage of fresh-water lakes is not within the purview and scope of the Indiana drainage act of 1881 as amended by the act of 1883, but such statute applies only to wet and marshy lands, swamps, ponds, and the like. Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. Ketring, 122 Ind. 5, 28 N. E. 527.

A provision in the drainage law of Illinois making the commissioners of highways of a town also the drainage commissioners thereof, is not invalid as an assumption of an appointing power which the legislature does not possess, but is the imposing by law of new duties, merely statutory, upon officers already chosen, and is by no means the appointment or selection of such officers by the legislative department. Kilgour v. Montmorency Twp. Drainage Comrs. 111 Ill. 342.

In order to make the construction of a ditch for the drainage of agricultural lands a public use sufficient to justify the exercise of the right of eminent domain, it is not necessary that the public at large shall be benefited, but only that a part of the public be affected by want of proper drainage; and the public has an interest beyond that of the mere sanitary condition of land, which is founded upon other and different principles than the controlling and abatement of nuisances, where any considerable number of persons are concerned, or tract of land is useless, and improvements may be made commensurate to the benefits received, and the lands taxed for such benefits. Lewis County v. Gordon, 20 Wash. 80, 54 Pac. 779.

The drainage of land by means of the organization of a drainage district under constitutional authority is not a mere private benefit, to aid in which public property cannot be appropriated. Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties, 193 Ill. 439, 58 L. R. A. 353, 62 N. E. 201.

Drainage ditches are public improvements for which the legislature has full power to provide, and may use local boards as convenient instrumentalities. State ex rel. Holtz v. Henry County, 41 Ohio St. 423.

The construction of a sewer is a local improvement where its cost is raised upon the property supposed to be benefited by it. A public improvement is one where the expense is charged upon all the taxable property within the municipality. Kinsella v. Auburn, 26 N. Y. S. R. 884, 7 N. Y. Supp. 317.

It is not necessary, in determining the public benefit of a proposed ditch, so as to justify the levying of special assessments for the cost thereof, to show the number of persons who, or that any particular person, will be benefited in health or comfort thereby; but, if it can be 60 L. R. A.

The act in question contemplates drainage for only a public purpose.

justly concluded, from the nature of the system of drainage adopted, that there will be a material element of public good in the result, then the purpose is a public one, and property may be assessed, even though the pond or marsh to be drained is wholly on the land of one citizen, which he is under no duty to drain at his own expense for the benefit of the community, although he may be compelled to pay the entire benefit which thereby accrues to his property. Zigler v. Menges, 121 Ind. 99, 22 N. E. 782.

The drainage laws in force prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1894, and of the general drainage act passed in pursuance thereof in 1895, were upheld only for the purpose of preserving the public health; and where, in a proceeding instituted thereunder, the proposed drain was determined not to be necessary for the public health, the commission should be dissolved. Re Drainage in Penfield, 3 App. Div. 30, 37 N. Y. Supp. 1056.

The provisions of N. Y. Laws 1867, chap. 372, for the draining of certain swamp lands, which empower the commissioners to enter on lands and construct ditches, and require them, upon making the assessments, to give notice of a day for their payment; and which authorize the sale of the lands assessed on the same day in case of nonpayment,—are unconstitutional as taking private property for private use without the consent of the owner; since they contain no reference to public health, nor to any other public purposes, but are solely for the benefit of the owners of the land to be drained; and also as taking property without due process of law, since they provide for no grievance day. People ex rel. Pulman v. Henlon, 64 Hun, 471, 19 N. Y. Supp. 488.

A municipal corporation is vested with the power of drainage and to organize drainage districts for that purpose solely by reason of the sanitary benefits to the public and the improvement of the streets which will result from the drainage, and a drainage district so organized is a public, and not a private, corporation; and, although it incidentally is of great benefit to the owners of contiguous real estate, and it is solely by reason thereof that such owners may be taxed by special assessment for the costs of the drainage, yet such fact does not change the character of the corporation. Springer v. Walters, 139 Ill. 419, 28 N. E. 761.

A drainage act is unconstitutional and void which authorizes the formation of drainage districts upon the signing of an agreement by two thirds of the landowners owning two thirds of the land in the proposed district, but which does not require that the drainage shall benefit the

The right of eminent domain not only invades no private right, but, because essential to the welfare of society, is paramount to the interests of any individual.

Only the validity of the act can be considered in this proceeding.

The legislature may well have considered that its opinion of what was expedient and proper was paramount to that of any board of county commissioners or other inferior body.

lic health or otherwise be of public utility, or even that the lands shall be swamp or wet lands, for it is only by virtue of its public utility that the legislature has the power to compel landowners benefited to pay for the construction of public ditches. Gifford Drainage Dist. v. Shroer, 145 Ind. 572, 44 N. E. 636.

But an act of the legislature authorizing the owner of wet lands to drain and reclaim the same by constructing a drain over the lands of others, and to assess the benefits and damages incident thereto on the lands affected, is not unconstitutional as delegating the power of eminent domain to one citizen, to be exercised over another citizen for a private advantage without declaring on its face that the drain will be in some way of public utility, as a ditch cannot be established under the statute without proof that it is of public utility,—and especially where the omission in that respect has been supplied by a later act, in conjunction with which the former act must be construed. Chambers v. Kyle, 67 Ind. 206.

The question of public utility of a proposed ditch is not to be split up and the drain defeated by showing that it will not be of public utility in one of the counties into which it extends. The public utility of a drain has reference to the ditch in its entirety, without regard to the counties that may be crossed by it. Meranda v. Spurlin, 100 Ind. 380.

The use of land sought to be condemned for municipal sewer purposes is none the less public because the city agrees to allow a hotel outside the corporate limits to share in the benefit of the improvement. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

Whether or not the use for which property is proposed to be taken for a ditch is a public use is a question of law, to be determined by the judicial power, and the fact that a proposed ditch would enable two parties to raise larger crops would not authorize a verdict in favor of establishing the ditch. McQuillen v. Hatton, 42 Ohio St. 202.

But whether or not a particular drain proposed to be established will be of public utility is a question of fact for the jury, which the court will not set aside unless the facts are insufficient to support their verdict. Zigler v. Menges, 121 Ind. 99, 22 N. E. 782.

The condemnation of land by a municipality for sewer purposes cannot be defeated on the ground that the proposed sewer will be a nuisance, injuriously affecting public health, where there is no evidence that the sewer, as it is proposed to be constructed, will be more of a nuisance than any sewer would be; if it becomes a nuisance it may be abated. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

The legislature may provide for, and compel, the clearing out of all such water courses and drains as are not, and never were, navigable, but which are necessary for carrying off the surplus rain water, thereby promoting the public health, and enabling a considerable portion of territory otherwise uninhabitable to be brought into cultivation. Brown v. Keener, 74 N. C. 714.

The whole of a ditching act must fall with that portion thereof providing for the condemnation of the right of way for the ditch which has been declared unconstitutional, where the authority to acquire such right of way by any other means is not given, and cannot be implied without destroying the force of other provisions of the act. Skagit County v. Stiles, 10 Wash. 388, 39 Pac. 116.

An exercise of police power.

The particular branch of governmental power to which the power of drainage is to be referred is undoubtedly the police power. But, by referring it to that power, as some courts have done, the authority over private property is not enlarged. The restrictions of the Constitution are still applicable.

Neither the United States Constitution, nor its Amendments, were designed to interfere with the power of the state, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the state, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity. From the very necessities of society, legislation of a special character, having this object in view, must often be had in certain districts, such as for the draining of marshes and irrigating arid plains. Regulations for these purposes may press with more or less weight upon one than upon another, but they are designed, not to impose unequal or unnecessary restrictions upon anyone, but to promote, with as little individual inconvenience as possible, the general good. Barber v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357.

Wis. drainage law 1885, chap. 442, providing for drainage upon petition of owners of swamp and overflowed land, stating that the land will be benefited and the public health promoted, and for the assessment of the costs to those whose lands are benefited, may be upheld as an exercise of the police power. Bryant v. Robins, 70 Wis. 258, 35 N. W. 545.

The presumption is that the commissioners for their construction, impliedly empowers the sanctioning of the building of such sewers at private expense. State, Hunt, Prosecutor, v. Lambertville, 45 N. J. L. 279.

Drainage laws in the interest of the public health and welfare are a proper exercise of the police power, and the fact that large tracts of otherwise waste lands may be thus reclaimed and made suitable for agricultural purposes is deemed and held to constitute a public benefit. Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1094.

A drainage law is in the interest of the public and for exclusively public purposes, and therefore a valid exercise of police power, when it provides that no ditch can be established or laid out thereunder unless the county commissioners expressly find that it will be of "public utility, or conducive to public health, or of public benefit or convenience." Ibid.

Local drains.

There is nothing in the Illinois Constitution which prohibits local or special legislation in respect to drainage where the direct prohibition of special legislation does not enumerate "drainage" as one of the subjects included, and the general clause at the end of § 22, that, "where a general law can be made applicable no special law shall be enacted," addresses itself to the general assembly alone. Owners of Lands v. People, ex rel. Stookey, 113 Ill. 296.

A municipal corporation has the power, under the Illinois general incorporation act, to construct a system of drainage in a district having its limits fixed and bounded by the ordinance providing for the improvement. Mason v. Chicago, 178 Ill. 499, 53 N. E. 354.

A municipal corporation may, under the general powers given it to make local improvements by special assessments, construct sewers in and drain a certain portion of its territory having its limits accurately bounded and defined by the ordinance providing for the same. Gray v. Cicero, 177 Ill. 459, 53 N. E. 91.

The laying of a sewer in a street by a private concern does not make the sewer public property, and a city, subsequently incorporated, does not, upon its incorporation, take title thereto. Oak Cliff Sewerage Co. v. Marshall (Tex. Civ. App.) 69 S. W. 176.

A municipal corporation does not adopt a private sewer as a public one by connecting its outlet with a public sewer. Re Evans Ave. Sewer, 32 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 24.

Statutory authority.

Express authority to cause public sewers to be constructed, and money to be raised and paid 60 L. R. A.

for their construction, impliedly empowers the sanctioning of the building of such sewers at private expense. State, Hunt, Prosecutor, v. Lambertville, 45 N. J. L. 279.

An act to provide for sewerage in townships in which there is a public water supply applies wherever the supply of water is available for public use, although not owned by the municipality. State, Gibbs, Prosecutor, v. Northampton Twp. 52 N. J. L. 496, 19 Atl. 975.

Drainage laws are to be liberally construed. Osborn v. Maxinkuckee Lake Ice Co. 154 Ind. 101, 56 N. E. 33.

A statute providing for the construction of sewers in any city of a specified class whenever the citizens thereof shall vote to adopt the provisions of the statute violates the provision of the Constitution providing that all cities of the same class shall have the same powers and be subject to the same restrictions. Owen v. Baer, 154 Mo. 434, 55 S. W. 644.

A ditch located and constructed under color of the statute, the expense of which has been paid for by the parties assessed without objection, and which has been in use for fifteen years or more, must be regarded and recognized by the township drain commissioner as a public drain duly and legally established. Zabel v. Harshman, 68 Mich. 273, 42 N. W. 44.

The right of highway commissioners in each town in the several counties adopting township organization to be a corporate body as drainage commissioners, under the drainage laws giving them that right, is a franchise. People v. O'Hair, 128 Ill. 20, 21 N. E. 211, Reversing 29 Ill. App. 239.

II. Institution of proceedings.

a. By petition of landowner.

The method of instituting proceedings for the establishment of drains is different under different statutes, and a different procedure is usually provided for different kinds of drains. The initiative with respect to city sewers usually lies with the legislative body of the municipality, and the consent of the taxpayers may or may not be required, at the will of the legislature. If a sewer is urgently demanded for the good of the public, the municipal authorities may be empowered to construct it, even against the protest of those upon whom the burden will fall. In the case of farm drainage, the initiative is usually given to those who are most interested in the proceeding, and assent of a majority in interest is required to start the proceedings for the establishment of the drain. Such assent may, of course, be required in case proceeded rightly and according to the statute, until the contrary appears.

With respect to the construction of ditches for draining wet and swampy lands in the interest of the public welfare, and assessing the expense thereof to the lands benefited, a county has been held to be a municipal corporation, and such ditches, local improve-of city sewers, and a provision in a system of legislation regulating the construction of sewers, requiring action by the municipality only upon the presentation of a petition of the taxpayers, cannot be dispensed with by the legislature only in cities having a certain specified population, such legislation being special within the meaning of the Constitution. State, Tyler, Prosecutor, v. Plainfield, 54 N. J. L. 529, 24 Atl. 494.

But petitioners for a public sewer cannot complain if the council exceeds their request by extending the desired sewer onto another street, as their individual liability is not increased thereby, and some latitude must necessarily be allowed public officials in doing such work. Re Maple Ave. & G. Street Sewer, 30 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 377.

The words "greatest part of them in interest," in a statute providing for the improvement of swamp lands and giving those having the greatest interest power to act, relate to proprietors having the greatest interest in value, and not to those owning the largest territorial area. Henry v. Thomas, 119 Mass. 583.

While the holder of any real or substantial interest is an owner of land affected or interested, within the meaning of the statute enacting that any owner of land to be benefited thereby may file a requisition for a drain upon obtaining the assent of the majority of the owners affected or interested, a mere tenant at will can neither file the requisition, nor be included in the majority required. Osgoode Twp. v. York, 24 Can. S. C. 282.

A lessee of land with an option to purchase the fee is not an owner within the meaning of the statute providing that the owner of land affected may institute proceedings for the construction of a drainage ditch. McKillop Twp. v. Logan Twp. 29 Can. S. C. 702.

A constitutional clause authorizing the passing of laws permitting the owners or occupants of lands to construct drains or ditches for agricultural or sanitary purposes across the lands of others implies that the community whose property is to be taxed may have the right of election in the matter, and a law authorizing a drainage system and the imposition of a special tax or special assessments therefor, without any previous vote of the persons affected thereby, is unconstitutional. Udike v. Wright, 81 Ill. 49.

In Michigan a township drain tax is illegal and void where it does not appear that five freeholders residing in the township presented a petition for its construction as required by statute. Frost v. Leatherman, 55 Mich. 33, 20 N. W. 705.

It is for the legislature to judge the degree of public necessity, and to what extent, on what occasion, and under what circumstances the power of eminent domain shall be exercised, and the courts cannot control the decision of the legislature on these points; but whether the use is public or private is for the judiciary.

However, a statutory provision that the petition to establish a drain must be signed by not less than five freeholders of the township or townships in which the drain or lands to be drained thereby may be situated, does not require the signatures of five freeholders of each township. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233.

A venire issued by the chairman of drainage commissioners, under the Michigan drainage laws of 1857, 1859, is invalid, and proceedings taken thereunder are void, where no application in reference to the construction of the drain was made to the commissioners by resident freeholders, as provided by the act. Palmer v. Rich, 12 Mich. 414.

A board of supervisors can order a construction of drainage ditches under the Iowa Code, authorizing the construction of drains which will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare only after a petition is presented signed by a majority of the persons residing in the county and owning land adjacent to the proposed improvement. Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 477.

When it sufficiently appears by the record of the county board in a drain case that there was a petition signed by one or more landowners who would be affected by the proposed ditch; that an undertaking was signed by them, as required by the statute; that the proposed improvement is necessary and will be conducive to the convenience, health, and welfare of the public; and that the statutory notice has been given,—the board has sufficient jurisdiction, although it does not find expressly that the petitioners are owners of land which would be benefited by the ditch, when that fact may be gathered from the petition, and is not made jurisdictional by the statute. Dakota County v. Cheney, 22 Neb. 437, 35 N. W. 211.

A provision in a drainage law authorizing only the owners of lands which will be benefited by drainage to institute proceedings for the establishment of a ditch does not make the ditch one intended only for private benefit, so as to render the law unconstitutional, where the statute requires the petition to state, and the commissioners to find, that the public health will be improved, or the public highways will be benefited, or the ditch will be of public utility, and authorizes landowners to remonstrate against the establishment upon the ground that the proposed work will not improve the public health, nor benefit the public highways, nor be of public utility, and authorizes a dismissal of the proceedings if the court finds in favor of the remonstrance, and also provides for keeping

The determination as to whether or not the right of eminent domain should be exercised, and as to what lands are necessary to be taken in the exercise of that right, is a political and legislative question, and not a judicial one. Its determination rests exclusively with the legislature, or with such such drains in repair and free from obstructions after construction, at public expense. Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79.

But a drainage act is unconstitutional, as permitting the taking of private property for private purposes, where it allows condemnation of land for a ditch or drain upon the petition of two or more landowners, if it is found that the construction of the ditch will be conducive to the general welfare of the landowners so petitioning. Nickey v. Stearns Ranchos Co. 126 Cal. 150, 58 Pac. 439.

It is no legal ground for the dismissal of ditch proceedings that all the land of the petitioners affected by it is situate within a comparatively short distance from its mouth or outlet, leaving the larger proportion of its length to be constructed at the cost of persons opposed to its establishment, and along the line of which is an old ditch sufficient to drain their lands if repaired; as the question as to whether the proposed ditch is more comprehensive, or embraces or affects more land, than is necessary to accomplish the drainage in the cheapest and best manner, is one exclusively for the viewers, and is not reviewable by the courts. Bonfoy v. Goar, 140 Ind. 292, 39 N. E. 56.

The trial court held in a case reversed in 49 L. R. A. 781, that the right of eminent domain for drainage purposes for the benefit of private owners of agricultural lands, conferred by N. Y. Const. 1894, art. 1, § 7, may be exercised by any number of land owners against all the parties affected to secure the drainage of an enlarged area; that the provision that general laws may be passed permitting the owners or occupants of agricultural lands to construct and maintain, for the drainage thereof, necessary drains, ditches, and dikes upon the lands of others, under proper restrictions, upon payment of just compensation, authorizes the passage of general drainage laws which would permit the drainage of more or less extended area upon the application of one or more persons and without the consent of others, but at the expense of all who may be affected thereby. Re Tuthill, 50 N. Y. Supp. 410.

That decision would have done away with the well-settled rule that the drainage must be for public benefit to authorize the proceedings; but the court, on appeal, held that the Constitution contemplated that the expense should be borne by the petitioner, and Judge Gray went further, and held that the provision for the drainage of private property violated the provision of the Federal Constitution against depriving a person of his property without due process of law, holding that drainage for private benefit was a taking of private property for private benefit.

The petitioner for the establishment of a ditch cannot dismiss his petition after the report of the commissioners has been filed and confirmed, and rights have been acquired, and money expended thereunder, although the order approving the report has been vacated for additional notice to omitted parties. Carr v. Boone, 108 Ind. 241, 9 N. E. 110.

After the presentation of a petition for the construction of a drain by a majority of those to be benefited thereby, and after surveys and estimates, followed by a withdrawal of enough of the petitioners to bring the number remaining below a majority, a by-law passed by the council after it had altered the original plans, reciting that a majority of those to be benefited had petitioned, and providing for the construction of the work according to the altered plans, should be quashed, as the council had no power to authorize the undertaking of any work other than that petitioned for, and, a sufficient number of the petitioners having withdrawn to reduce the number below the majority, the by-law, in reciting that a majority petitioned, was untrue. Misener v. Wainfleet Twp. 46 U. C. Q. B. 457.

b. By municipal ordinance.

Where authority is given to originate proceedings by municipal ordinance, certain requisites must be complied with. The ordinance, of course, must be regularly adopted, and may be impeached for any cause which would invalidate ordinances generally.

An order to construct sewers is a legislative act within the meaning of a charter requiring such acts to be adopted by ordinance; a mere resolution is insufficient. State ex rel. Paterson v. Barnet, 46 N. J. L. 62.

Sewers erected prior to legislative authorization for the erection of sewers by municipalities are private drains, even though constructed in a street, or though subsequently repaired by the municipality under legislative grant. Bangor v. Lausli, 51 Me. 521.

It is not a valid objection to a resolution of the Jersey City common council for a proposed sewer that it was not signed by the mayor, as the charter only requires that official to sign resolutions affecting the interest of the city, and, as the city at large pays no part of the expenses for the improvement, but these are borne by the property benefited, the city's interests are not affected. State, Plard, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 30 N. J. L. 148.

An ordinance authorizing the construction of subordinate legislative bodies as it may be properly devolved upon; and the question whether the exercise of the power is wise or not is one with which the judicial department has no concern.

The authority that makes the laws has large discretion in determining the means through which they shall be executed.

Shoemaker v. United States, 147 U. S. 282, 37 L. ed. 170, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 361.

a sewer, adopted at a special meeting, is not rendered invalid by reason of the fact that the mayor, in his message submitted at such meeting, declared the purpose of the meeting to be the consideration of an ordinance to establish a sewer district, and made no reference to the construction of the sewer, where it was clear that he intended to include such construction in the purpose of the meeting. Dollar Sav. Bank v. Ridge, 62 Mo. App. 324.

When a municipal assembly is vested with the power to pass an ordinance for the construction of a sewer, its acts under that power, in the absence of fraud, are conclusive upon the courts, whether the attack made thereon be collateral or direct. Akers v. Kolkmeier (Mo. App.) 71 S. W. 536.

A sewer built in pursuance of a resolution of the city council, and paid for out of money in the city treasury provided for that purpose, is a public sewer in law, as much as if it had originally been established by ordinance. Ibid.

The fact that an ordinance authorizing the construction of a sewer took effect at the same time as an ordinance establishing the district in which it was to be constructed did not invalidate it, although the municipal charter authorized the construction of sewers only in established districts. Eyerman v. Blaksley, 78 Mo. 145.

Although the Constitution providing that the legislature may vest cities, towns, and villages with the power to make local improvements by special assessments of the cost upon property benefited does not mention counties, an act of the legislature authorizing counties to construct drains by levying the cost upon lands benefited is not void as violative of the Constitution. Darst v. Griffin, 31 Neb. 668, 48 N. W. 819.

c. By organisation of drainage district.

Under the statutes of some of the states, drainage proceedings are instituted by the organization of drainage districts, which are a form of governmental corporation with very limited powers, and the actual creation of the drains and the collection of the funds to pay for them and other necessary work are done by the officers of the district.

The effect of an amendment to the Illinois Constitution authorizing the creation of drainage districts and the levy of special assessments for the construction of the drainage therein is to invest drainage districts with power to make local improvements by special assessments, which prior to such amendment was confined to towns, cities, and villages; and the power of 60 L. R. A.

the legislature to authorize the formation of sanitary districts, and to invest other corporate authorities with power to levy and collect general taxes for sanitary purposes, is unaffected by such amendments. Wilson v. Sanitary Dist. 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 203.

It is said that a reclamation district is a public corporation which may be created, not only by the means and in the manner provided by the general law, but also by special act, or by implication of law, legislative recognition of a corporation in many cases being sufficient proof of its existence. People v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 53 Cal. 346; Reclamation Dist. No. 124 v. Gray, 95 Cal. 601, 30 Pac. 779.

The legislature has the authority, under its police power, to authorize the organization of companies for the purpose of draining swamp and wet lands, with the reasonable exercise of which the courts cannot interfere. O'Reiley v. Kankakee Valley Draining Co. 32 Ind. 169.

An act of the legislature authorizing the organization of draining companies composed of the landowners interested, to construct levees, dikes, and drains, and to reclaim wet and overflowed land, the cost thereof to be paid by special assessment, is a reasonable exercise of the police power of the state, and is valid. Ibid.

An act authorizing the creation of a corporation for the purpose of constructing drains and levees to be made for the public benefit, with power to exercise the right of eminent domain, and taxation for that purpose, leaving it for the court to determine in each particular case whether the levee or drain in that case is for public use or benefit, is constitutional and valid. Anderson v. Kerns Draining Co. 14 Ind. 199, 77 Am. Dec. 63.

An act of the legislature creating a sanitary district with power to secure the public health by means of sewers and channels, or drains, is within the police power of a state. Wilson v. Sanitary Dist. 133 Ill. 443, 27 N. E. 203.

An act of the legislature authorizing the drainage of wet land in certain townships of a county, and constituting certain persons therein named a corporation with power to levy a tax, under the name of an assessment, upon the lands therein deemed by the corporation to be benefited by the proposed improvement, is unconstitutional and void as being contrary to the constitutional provisions prohibiting the levying of a local tax by other than the corporate authorities,—such corporation not being “corporate authorities” because its members were neither directly elected by the inhabitants of the district nor appointed in some mode to which they had given their assent. Hessler v. Drainage Comrs. 53 Ill. 105.

But, under a provision of the Constitution of Illinois authorizing the general assembly to pass laws permitting the owners of lands to construct drains, ditches, and levees for agricultural, sanitary, or mining purposes across the lands of others, and provide for the organization of drainage districts, and to vest the corporate authorities thereof with power, etc., the general assembly, and not the owners of lands, may provide for the organization of such districts, and vest the corporate authorities thereof with power, and no limitation or restriction exists as to the agencies to be used in the creation of the corporation; and a statute investing the county court with power to inquire into and find the existence of certain preliminary facts deemed important as prerequisites to the corporation is valid. Blake v. People use of Caldwell, 109 Ill. 504.

The fact that a drainage law provides that the county court shall find certain essential facts preliminary to the creation of a drainage district and the formation of the corporate authorities thereof does not make that body, when formed, the creature of the court, but it is merely the creation by the legislature of such court as its agent to make investigations and determine facts not convenient for it to perform,—which it has the right to do in the absence of limitation upon it in the constitutional clause authorizing the creation of such drainage districts,—as to the mode of forming the districts; and, inasmuch as such constitutional provision does not require that the corporate authorities shall be elected by the people of the district, their appointment by the county court is not unconstitutional, since this clause in the Constitution, being an amendment so far as it invades the former limitations of the Constitution, must prevail, and such limitations must be held not to apply to the subject-matter of the levying of special assessments upon lands within a drainage district for benefits thereby conferred. Huston v. Clark, 112 Ill. 344.

A drainage act is not unconstitutional as violating the constitutional provision prohibiting the legislature from appointing or electing any person to an office because it provides that the county commissioners shall be the drainage commissioners of their respective counties. No new office is created, but new duties are added to an office already created and whose officers are elected by the people, and, being the corporate authorities before the passage of that act, the addition of new duties, and declaring that, as to such duties, such corporation shall be known 60 L. by a different name, do not change the constituents thereof. Owners of Lands v. People ex rel. Stookey, 118 Ill. 296.

A drainage law, providing that the county commissioners shall be the drainage commissioners in their respective counties is not unconstitutional because they are not elected by the people of the drainage district or appointed by any mode to which they have given their assent, where no clause in the Constitution contains such a requirement, and no clause of that instrument prohibits making the county commissioners the corporate authorities for every drainage district in the county, although they are elected by the votes of others in the county as well as those of the drainage district; and the constitutional provision prohibiting the state from creating a debt exceeding a certain sum without the consent of the people does not apply in this case, because the only debt authorized by such act to be created must be paid by a special assessment upon the property specially benefited by the proposed improvement, which is not a personal charge, but one only against the property specially assessed, which property may belong to a very few voters of the district, and whose rights are protected by a provision in the act requiring, as a condition precedent to the organization of the district, that a majority in number of the adult owners of lands lying in the proposed district, and who are the owners in the aggregate of more than one third of the lands lying in such district, shall petition for its formation, and allowing other landowners to appear and contest the formation thereof. Ibid.

Under a provision in the Constitution authorizing the general assembly to pass laws permitting the owners of lands to construct drains, etc., for agricultural, sanitary, or mining purposes, across the lands of others, and to provide for the organization of drainage districts, and to vest the corporate authorities thereof with power to construct and maintain drains, etc., by special assessments upon the property benefited thereby, the general assembly may pass a law making the corporate authorities of cities and villages the drainage commissioners thereof with power to determine what portion of the lands within such cities or villages shall be drained, which portion, when so determined, thereby becomes a drainage district, and vesting in such corporate authorities the power to construct and maintain such drains and pumping works as are necessary for the purpose of draining the lands in such district, and to levy special assessments for the cost thereof upon the lands benefited thereby. *Hyde Park v. The drainage laws of Illinois do not authorize the organization into one drainage district of lands so related with respect to drainage as to require four main ditches as outlets to four separate areas of low and wet land, having divides or swells of higher land between them, each ditch having a different direction, the construction of which necessarily does not benefit the lands of the other three areas, and in effect being four entirely separate and independent drainage districts under one organization,—especially where such district also includes an incorporated village, having by law independent powers of its own in respect to drainage, also much land needing no drainage, and that will not be drained by any of the proposed systems. Klinger v. People ex rel. Conkle, 130 Ill. 509, 22 N. E. 600, Affirming 28 Ill. App. 575.

Merely because the channel of a sanitary district, when constructed, will be capable of answering the purpose of navigation, and the driving of machinery, does not imply that the scheme was undertaken with the view of constructing a navigable waterway, and of creating a water power, as well as that of promoting and preserving the public health by furnishing a suitable and efficient means of carrying off the drainage and sewage of the district; and that a statute, creating such district, provides for the three subjects, does not render the creation of such sanitary district unconstitutional because the other two subjects are not expressed in the title, since they may be disregarded without affecting the legality of the drainage district. *People ex rel. other material necessary for the right of way, for the construction, maintenance, or improvement of the work,—because it permits an entry upon the lands and construction of drains whenever the private interest of the corporation requires it, without reference to the public welfare is an infringement of the right of private property, and is void. *Jenal v. In Indiana it has been held that it is a good defense to an action by a ditching company to collect an assessment against lands for benefits conferred by a drain that the company was not legally organized, and is not a corporation. Excelsior Draining Co. v. Brown, 47 Ind. 19.

But a land owner within a drainage district cannot, upon application for judgment for taxes and special assessments against his land, collaterally call in question the regularity of the organization of the district. Tucker v. People ex rel. Wall, 156 Ill. 108, 40 N. E. 451.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Certiorari to the board of county commissioners of Polk county to review the proceedings had by them in the matter of laying out a ditch or drain under and pursuant to the provisions of chapter 258, Gen. Laws 1901. It appears from the record before us that a petition in due form, dated September 18, 1901, signed by persons whose lands would be affected by the proposed ditch, was filed in the office of the county auditor of Polk county, praying for the construction of a ditch or drain which was described therein, and extends for a distance of several miles. The petition was in all respects in compliance with the statute, and, in terms, represented to the board of commissioners "that the public health, convenience, and welfare" would be promoted by the establishment of the proposed ditch. Whereupon, and after due notice, given as required by the statute, the board of commissioners convened in special session, heard and considered the petition, and caused the appointment of a civil engineer to make a survey of the route of the ditch, and to report the same to the board for its further action. The survey was duly made and reported, whereupon the commissioners, as provided by the statute, made an order appointing viewers, who duly examined the proposed improvement, and reported the result there-

A landowner within a drainage district cannot resort to the common-law writ of certiorari for the purpose of determining the legality of the organization of such district,—especially where, by statute, a complete remedy by quo warranto is provided. Lees v. The New Jersey statute (1870, Pamph. Driggs Drainage Co. 45 N. J. L. 91.

A power in a municipal corporation to create special improvement districts does not prohibit the inclusion of the whole municipality in one district. Minnesota & M. Land & Improv. Co. v. Billings, 50 C. C. A. 70, 111 Fed. 972.

Inclusion of lands.

The right of drainage commissioners to annex lands to the district when the owners thereof connect with the district drain or will be benefited thereby is purely a statutory right unknown at common law. Allman v. Lumsden, 48 Ill. App. 17.

Lands having their drains connected with the ditches of a drainage district may, under the Illinois drainage law, be annexed to that district, although they may also lie within another district. Ibid.

Though the act of owners of lands lying outside of a drainage district in connecting their lands by ditches with the ditches of the district amounts to an application for their lands to be taken into the district, and the commissioners of the district may make an order annexing such lands, still one landowner, by making a ditch across his land which carries water from the lands of a third person to the district ditch, cannot thereby give the district jurisdiction over the lands of such 60 L. III. Jurisdiction over proceedings.

a. In general.

The general rule is that the question of jurisdiction over the proceedings depends upon the language of the statute; but some questions have arisen as to the right of the legislature to clothe a particular tribunal with authority, and as to conflicting authority under different statutory provisions.

Of course the question of jurisdiction is very important, for, if no jurisdiction is obtained, no title can be acquired for a right of way, and no valid assessment can be laid to pay for it or for the labor expended upon the improvement.

The commissioners of sewers have no power to create and cause to be maintained new rivers which did not exist at the time of Magna Charta. Isle of Ely's Case, 10 Coke, 141.

The sewer commissioners have no jurisdiction over streams at points more than 2 miles distant from London, unless they are navigable. Yeaw v. Holland, 2 W. Bl. 717.

The statutory provision that the collection of assessments shall not be defeated by reason of any defect in the proceedings occurring prior to the judgment confirming and establishing the assessment, but that such judgment shall be conclusive of the legality thereof, is not applicable to the proceedings that confer jurisdiction. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

The legislature may delegate the exercise of the right of eminent domain to town supervisors or overseers of highways. Smeaton v. Martin, 57 Wis. 364, 15 N. W. 403.

The legislature may constitutionally delegate to police juries the power to open ancient natural drains and remove obstructions therefrom. Avery v. Police Jury, 12 La. Ann. 554.

So, the legislature may delegate to a municipal corporation power to tax for a sewer to be constructed under direction of certain officers of the corporation. Re Zborowski, 68 N. Y. 88.

of, and the commissioners formally made an order that the ditch be constructed. The final order recites all the facts essential to authorize the same to be made, viz., the filing of the petition, notice of hearing thereon, the appointment of a civil engineer and viewers, their report that the estimated benefits to be derived from the ditch were greater than its cost, including damages awarded, and, further, that, in the opinion of the board, the construction of the ditch "will be of public utility, and conducive to the public health and public benefit and convenience." Upon the making and filing of the order, relators sued out this writ, upon the theory and contention that the act of the legislature referred to, and under which the proceedings in question were conducted, is unconstitutional and void, because it provides for the taking of private property of individuals for a private purpose, and, further, that the description of the proposed ditch, as contained in the petition therefor, is so indefinite and uncertain as to confer no jurisdiction upon the commissioners, if the statute be held constitutional. The main question in the case is the constitutionality of the statute, and we proceed at once to its consideration.

Section 1 of the act vests in the board of county commissioners authority, and makes it their duty, to construct any ditch, drain, or water course, when they find to exist the conditions specified in § 2. Section 2 provides and requires that the petition praying for the establishment of the ditch must set forth, among other things, the necessity for it, its general course and distance, and the lands through which it will pass. It further provides for the appointment of a civil

But the power of the legislature to regulate the construction of public sewers cannot be foreclosed by a contract of a municipal corporation. Re Protestant Episcopal Public School, 46 N. Y. 178, Reversing 58 Barb. 161.

A statute providing for the drainage of lands in a certain county, and clearly indicating the nature and extent of such drainage, and delegating to drainage commissioners the power to determine what lands shall be drained and what lands assessed therefor, is not invalid as a delegation to them of the legislative power of creating and defining districts for drainage purposes. State ex rel. Baltzell v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 6 L. R. A. 394, 43 N. W. 947.

The legislature is not prevented from granting to a board of drainage commissioners, by a special act, authority to exercise the police power of the state for the drainage of lands of a county, by a constitutional provision prohibiting it from enacting a special or private law granting corporate powers or privileges except to cities. Ibid.

An act authorizing cities acting under special charters, and containing more than a designated population, to establish a system of sewerage, and to construct, establish, and keep in repair sewers, culverts, and drains, is not within the constitutional inhibition of special legislation. Rutherford v. Heddens, 82 Mo. 388.

The drainage of swamp lands, when made under the general provisions of the New York statutes, is a state work, and, when completed, the title to the land acquired is in the state. Re Swan, 35 Hun, 625.

The constitutional provision forbidding the passage of a local bill for the drainage of swamps or other low lands does not invalidate a local statute designed to provide means for disposing of the sewage of a thickly populated section, a portion of which is within the limits of a city and the remainder of which will soon need such accommodations, although much surface water will flow through the drain, and many low pieces of ground be drained by it. Swikehard v. Michels, 81 Hun, 325, 29 N. Y. Supp. 777, 30 N. Y. Supp. 1135.

An act of the legislature vesting the corporate authorities of cities and villages with power to construct, maintain, and keep in repair drains, ditches, levees, dykes, and pumping works for drainage purposes, and to levy special assessments upon the property benefited thereby for the cost thereof, is not in contravention of any of the provisions of the Illinois Constitution. McChesney v. Hyde Park (Ill.) 28 N. E. 1102.

Commissioners appointed by an act of the legislature to levy special taxes upon lands lying in a designated district for the purpose of drainage, such act providing that the same shall be submitted to a vote of the inhabitants of such district, and that, unless adopted, it shall be of no force,—if the act is adopted by the voters, as required, may be regarded as corporate authority, and have the power, under the Constitution, to assess and collect taxes for the cost of such drainage. Lee v. Ruggles, 62 Ill. 427.

A district carved out of two or more towns, over which a statutory commission, to be continued by elections, is constituted with power to repair, work, and grade streets, to regulate the width and grade of sidewalks, the manner of paving streets, and constructing sewers, to borrow money, appoint superintendents of roads, establish a fire department and purchase fire apparatus and land and engine houses, and to impose taxes to carry out the purposes of the act constituting them,—is a political division, and not a mere taxing district of narrower bounds; and the commission is invested with political and governmental powers and functions; hence, it has the legal power to levy an assessment for sewers. State, Auryansen, Prosecutor, v. Hackensack Improvement Commission, 45 N. J. L. 113.

A petition for a drain, under Iowa Code 1873, chap. 2, title 10, and chap. 186, Acts 20th Gen. Assem., is the basis of the jurisdiction to order a drain, and, if it contain the requisite number of signatures when filed, the jurisdiction attaches to order the drain; and a subsequent withdrawal of the names, or a protest or remonstrance against the drain by the petitioners, although proper to be taken into consideration by the board of supervisors, does not prevent the jurisdiction to order the drain attaching. Selbert v. Lovell, 92 Iowa, 507, 61 N. W. 197.

After the board of supervisors has been properly petitioned to establish a drain for certain territory, it has jurisdiction to establish such drainage within the territory and through such land as it deems proper, to effect the reclaiming of the swamp and overflow lands in the locality to be drained, under acts 20th Iowa Gen. Assem. chap. 186. Butts v. Monona County, 100 Iowa, 74, 39 N. W. 284.

Jurisdiction for the assessment of private property for a sewer may be obtained when the plan is completed and filed, the district is established, and notice given to property owners of the fact, and requiring them to appear and file objections to the proposed work. Hennessy v. Douglas County, 90 Wis. 120, 74 N. W. 983.

It is not a ground of objection to commissioners to assess for drainage as being interested engineer by the board to make a survey of the proposed ditch, and that such engineer shall take and subscribe an oath for the faithful performance of his duties. Upon the filing of his report the board is required by § 5 to appoint viewers, who are also required to take and subscribe an oath of office, and whose duties are to examine into the merits of the contemplated improvement, and to estimate and report the damages and benefits to each tract of land through or adjacent to which the ditch may pass. Upon their report being made and filed, and after due notice of hearing is given, the board is required to hear and determine the matter. Other sections provide in detail the necessary steps to be taken in carrying out its objects and purposes. Section 6 expressly limits the levying of assessments to the construction of public ditches. There is no express provision in the statute making it the duty of the board to find whether the proposed ditch will be a public benefit, nor is there any express declaration in the act itself that such fact must exist before a ditch may be ordered constructed; and it is argued from this that the act was not intended by the legislature for the public welfare, but, on the contrary, to authorize the construction of ditches for purely private purposes, to enhance the value of individual farms. If this be the true interpretation or construction of the act, it must be held unconstitutional and void; for the legislature has no power to authorize the taking of private property for a private use, nor to compel the payment of assessments for the construction or erection of any public improvement, if such improvement furthers private interthat they are only shown to own lands not far from the drainage ditch and to share in the benefits accruing to the neighborhood from increased healthfulness; they must be shown to own lands directly and certainly benefited by the drainage alone. State, Shinkle, Prosecutor, v. Clinton, 39 N. J. L. 656.

Public benefit being essential to the right to take private property for a drainage ditch, if the viewers find that there will be no public benefit from a proposed ditch the drainage commissioners acquire no jurisdiction; and their order dismissing the proceeding is not subject to review by the courts, unless the fact on which jurisdiction exists is absent. Oathout v. Seabrooke (Ind.) 65 N. E. 521.

Power given drainage commissioners to continue a main ditch for the drainage of swamp lands through lands adjoining the swamp if necessary does not permit them to construct a ditch through the swamp to a pond or reservoir used for a water supply, and then lower the outlet of the pond so as to drain it and the surrounding swamp to the destruction of mill sites located on it. Belknap v. Belknap, 2 Johns. Ch. 463, 7 Am. Dec. 548.

The location and construction of one ditch by the township trustees to drain certain territory does not exhaust the power of draining over that territory, nor confine it to the deepening and widening of such previously constructed ditch, since the only limitation under the Ohio statute as to the number, course, and location of township ditches is that they shall be conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare. Miller v. Weber, 1 Ohio C. C. 130.

The right of a board of drainage commissioners to organize and assume the functions of a corporate body cannot be questioned in a proceeding to enjoin the collection of an assessment. Kelgwin v. Hamilton Twp. Drainage Comrs. 115 Ill. 347, 5 N. E. 575.

Two members of the board of county commissioners have no authority to order the construction of a drain upon a consideration by them of a petition therefor in a meeting with the county surveyor on a day to which the commissioners had not adjourned, and when a special session had not been called; and the special assessments for the ditch are absolutely void. Morris v. Merrell, 44 Neb. 423, 62 N. W. 865.

Highway commissioners, exercising the special and added authority of drainage commissioners, do so, in contemplation of the law authorizing it, not as highway commissioners, but as a body of men to whom are delegated the power and authority of commissioners of the drainage districts organized by and under the 60 L. R. A.

statute. People ex rel. Hardy v. Young America Drainage Dist. 143 Ill. 417, 32 N. E. 686.

A proceeding under the county drain law to determine the necessity of a drain and to assess damages is void where it appears that a person not appointed as a commissioner by the court acted as such, although the person who served was the one the court intended to appoint, but was mistaken as to his name. Bench v. Otis, 25 Mich. 29.

Under a statute authorizing the board of supervisors to appoint drain commissioners, and to supervise their action, the board has no right to appoint its own members as drain commissioners, and such appointment, as well as the drain tax levied by such commissioners, is void. Kinyon v. Duchene, 21 Mich. 498.

b. Of courts.

The establishment of drains being a governmental duty, some question has been raised as to the right of the legislature to impose the duty of supervision upon the courts. But it is generally held that such course is proper if the actual minutiae of the work are in the hands of political officers, while the duty of the court is merely to guard the legal rights of the parties.

A drainage act does not impose legislative and executive duties upon the court because the commissioners upon whom such duties are imposed are appointed by the court, report to and are liable to removal by the court, as such act does not render them mere agents of the court, nor impose upon it the duties discharged by them, so as to render the act unconstitutional for that reason. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

That the court determines whether the proposed work shall be undertaken, and that such judicial determination is the foundation of the assessment made by the commissioners upon the land benefited by a drainage system, cannot be said to be a direct exercise by the court of the power of taxation which will render void the act providing for such drainage system, as attempting to confer such power upon the court. Bryant v. Robbins, 70 Wis. 258, 35 N. W. 545.

The judgment of a court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the construction of public drains, establishing a particular ditch, cannot be collaterally attacked, although it had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of that particular case, because the petition showed on its face that the effect of its construction would be to lower certain fresh-water lakes, which is a purpose outside the scope of the drainage law. Perkins v. Hayward, 182 Ind. 95, 81 N. E. 670.

ests only. It may be observed, further, in reference to the terms and provisions of the act, that ample notice is given and opportunity afforded all interested parties to appear and be heard at every step in the proceedings. An appeal is provided upon the question of damages and benefits, and from an order refusing to lay out the ditch, though none is provided from an order directing its construction.

The question as to the propriety and necessity of legislation such as that here under consideration, if it only authorizes the taking of private property for public use, is one exclusively for legislative cognizance, and with the exercise of its judgment in that behalf the courts have no power to interfere; and in respect to whether a statute providing a general system for draining wet and overflowed lands of the state is a public necessity, and the interests and welfare of the people demand it, the courts are not concerned. But the question whether a particular improvement under such a statute will inure to the public health, convenience, or welfare is a judicial one, which the legislature cannot determine to the exclusion of the courts. Such statutes usually submit that question to local tribunals in express terms, but no such provision, in express language, is found in the act under consideration. Two main contentions are made against the constitutionality of this act: First, that it does not expressly and in so many words declare that the public health, convenience, and welfare are intended to be subserved and promoted; and, second, that no provision is made for the determination of that question by the county commissioners.

The jurisdiction of a court of general jurisdiction to establish a public drain partly within the corporate limits of a city cannot be collaterally attacked in a proceeding to enforce the assessment levied on lands within the municipality for the construction of the ditch, where the court, having exclusive jurisdiction of the drainage proceedings by virtue of the act under which it was prosecuted, had jurisdiction of the cause, and authority to determine what property was subject to assessment, although its judgment establishing the ditch within the corporate limits might be erroneous. State ex rel. Wilcox v. Jackson, 118 Ind. 563, 21 N. E. 321.

c. Conflicting authority.

There has been considerable conflict between different bodies claiming jurisdiction over a particular drain, both as between different organizations within the same territory and between authorities constituted over different sections of territory. The conflict, for the most part, grows out of the interpretation of the statutes, and is emphasized by implications which are sought to be drawn from partial authority actually conferred.

Highway commissioners may not, under color of power to preserve, repair, and improve a highway, enter upon the construction of a ditch for drainage purposes, and thereby usurp the power of drain commissioners. Conrad v. Smith, 32 Mich. 429.

The laying of a sewer or a water main in a boulevard under the control of a park board, for the supply of sewer and water service to residents on the boulevard, is not an improvement to the boulevard, within the meaning of a statutory provision authorizing park boards to make assessments for the purpose of improving any boulevard, driveway, or street. Lingle v. Chicago, 172 Ill. 170, 50 N. E. 192.

Statutory authority to make assessments for the purpose of improving boulevards, etc., does not confer upon a park board the power to levy an assessment for sewers and water mains intended solely to supply sewer and water service to residents on a boulevard, and not for the purpose of draining or benefiting the boulevard itself. West Chicago Park v. Baldwin, 162 Ill. 87, 44 N. E. 404.

In North Dakota, the county commissioners cannot, under their general powers given them by a general law to transact the "affairs" and "fiscal affairs" of the county, engage in the work of constructing drains, and exercise the powers of eminent domain for that purpose. This is a special purpose, and its accomplishment 60 L. R. A.

ment requires special legislative authority which may be placed wherever the legislature regards proper. Martin v. Tyler, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838, 60 N. W. 392.

The establishment of a township ditch by the trustees thereof, further action in reference to which cannot be taken by them of their own volition, but only on petition presented therefor, does not give them such a continuing and exclusive jurisdiction of the line thereof as to prevent the establishment of a county ditch over the same line, where necessary for drainage purposes and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare. Marsh v. Clark County, 11 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 290.

The legislature has the power to give the circuit court jurisdiction to construct drains partly within a city's limits, notwithstanding the exclusive jurisdiction of cities over drainage within their limits, since their jurisdiction is subject to legislative withdrawal or modification; and furthermore, the matter of drainage in county and city conjointly is a new subject-matter, previously unprovided for. Sauntman v. Maxwell, 154 Ind. 114, 54 N. E. 397.

But drainage commissioners have no lawful authority to construct a drain in whole or in part within the limits of a municipal corporation, where the latter has the exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of drains and streets within its limits, notwithstanding a clause in the drainage act which provides that a petition for drainage shall state that, in the opinion of the petitioner, either the public health will be improved or one or more highways of the county or streets of a town or city will be benefited by the proposed drainage; as a city street may be benefited by a drain constructed adjacent thereto and not within its limits. Anderson v. Endicutt, 101 Ind. 539.

Where lands affected by a proposed ditch and embraced in an assessment therefor are located in different counties, a provision in the drainage act giving the courts of the county in which the petition for the construction of the ditch is filed, and where part of the lands to be affected lie, jurisdiction of all the lands assessed, is constitutional and valid. Shaw v. State use of Whitmore, 97 Ind. 23.

The fact that lands affected and assessed for the construction of a ditch lie in two or more counties does not affect the authority and duty of the commissioner appointed by the court of the county where the proceedings were instituted to construct the ditch in its entirety, and assess all lands affected, whether in that or adjoining counties, in accordance with a provision of the drainage law under which the ditch is

The act is entitled to a fair and reasonable construction, and one that will give effect to the intention of the legislature. As remarked in the case of State ex rel. Railroad & W. Commission v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 38 Minn. 281, 37 N. W. 782: "Legislative enactments are not to be defeated on account of mistakes, omissions, or inaccuracies of language, any more than other writings, provided the intention of the legislature can be ascertained from the whole act. In construing a statute, we must assume, if its language will admit, that the legislature intended to act within its constitutional power. We must also, if possible, so construe the language as to make it effectual." The rule thus laid down is one of general application, followed and applied by all the courts. Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 234 et seq. It is urged by relators that from the fact that all prior statutes of this character in terms expressly declared that a proposed improvement might be ordered by the authorities when the public health, convenience, or welfare would be promoted thereby, and from the further fact that the court in Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1094, held, in construing the general statutes on the subject of drainage, that such statutes can only be sustained when enacted in the interests of the public welfare, the omission of this provision from the act under consideration shows an intent on the part of the legislature to depart from that rule. It has always been the law in this state that private property may not be taken for a private use, though by the Constitution the legislature may authorize it to be taken for a public use upon just compensation being first paid established. Crist v. State ex rel. Whitmore, 97 Ind. 389.

As the authority to construct drains or ditches, or change water courses, as possessed by the board of supervisors under Iowa Code 1873, § 1207, has not been conferred on incorporated towns, and as its exercise is not inimical or repugnant to any of the powers granted to such corporations, it was not the purpose of the legislature to restrict such authority, by implication or otherwise, to that portion of the county outside of their limits. Aldrich v. Paine, 106 Iowa, 461, 76 N. W. 812.

Where jurisdiction of the construction of a ditch is given to commissioners of the county in which its head is located, such commissioners will not have jurisdiction of an entire system, consisting of a main ditch and a branch with a head in another county, where the branch is in fact a separate ditch. Bondurant v. Arney, 152 Ind. 244, 53 N. E. 169.

The legislature may confer upon the supervisors of one county the power to include within a reclamation district lands within another county. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945.

The courts of one county have the power and jurisdiction, under the Indiana drainage act, to establish a drain a portion of which extends into an adjoining county. Meranda v. Spurlin, 100 Ind. 380.

The court of the county in which drainage proceedings are instituted has jurisdiction and authority to establish a ditch extending into another county, and to make assessments against lands situate in that county, by virtue of a statute conferring that power. Hudson v. Bunch, 116 Ind. 63, 18 N. E. 390.

Where a ditch extends into or through two or more counties, proceedings to establish it may, under the Indiana drainage act, be prosecuted in either county. Updegraff v. Palmer, 107 Ind. 181, 6 N. E. 353.

Where no suitable outlet for a sewer can be found in the town making the same, its extension into an adjoining town to a proper outlet cannot be regarded as a violation of a statute against the assessment of property in one town for the making of local improvements in another town. Such extension cannot be regarded as a local improvement in another town. Shreve v. Cicero, 129 Ill. 226, 21 N. E. 815.

The courts of one county have the power, under a drainage act authorizing it, to establish a ditch extending into an adjoining county, and to order assessments on lands in that county affected thereby. Buchanan v. Rader, 97 Ind. 603.

The fact that swamp lands are located in more than one county will not prevent the legislature from delegating authority to establish a reclamation district to the supervisors of that county in which the greater part of the lands is situated. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663.

The joint action, under the Ohio statutes, of the several boards of commissioners of adjoining counties in establishing a ditch which is partly located in each of their respective counties is held, in Engle v. Defiance County, 25 Ohio St. 425, to be equivalent to a finding of a jury as to the necessity and conduciveness to public health, convenience, and welfare, and is final.

But joint action by different township drain commissioners is not authorized by statute in Michigan and such action extending over more than one township is not legal. Alger v. Slaght, 64 Mich. 589, 31 N. W. 531.

The joint action of township drain commissioners in the construction of drains extending over more than one township is illegal and without statutory authority. Hubbell v. Robinson, 65 Mich. 538, 32 N. W. 811.

So, a township drain commissioner has no power, under the Michigan statute, to lay out a drain through other townships than his own, or to assess the cost of construction against lands in such other township. Robertson v. Baxter, 57 Mich. 127, 23 N. W. 711.

A drainage district organized under the drainage laws of Illinois must be deemed to be existing and located, for all purposes of jurisdiction, in every part of its territory; and the fact that the original organization of the district was effected in one county, or that the custodian of the records thereof resides in that county, will not affect the jurisdiction of the courts of another county in which the boundaries of such district extend. Mason & T. Special Drainage Dist. v. Griffin, 134 Ill. 330, 25 N. E. 995.

IV. Plans and specifications.

a. Practicability.

1. In general.

Taxpayers have a right to demand that before a drainage improvement is entered upon it shall have been determined to be practicable, and that the general character of the improvement shall be designated. When they are entitled to pass upon the question whether or not the improvement shall be made, they can exor secured; and it should undoubtedly appear, either from the express language of the statute authorizing such an appropriation, or from a fair and reasonable interpretation of the whole enactment, that the interests of the public health, convenience, or welfare are intended to be promoted. We are bound to assume, as held in the case just cited, that the legislature intended to keep within constitutional limits in the passage of this act, and this presumption cannot be rebutted except by the clearest and most persuasive language showing to the contrary. We are not authorized to indulge in the presumption that the legislature willfully intended by the passage of this act to depart from the settled law of the land. Robinson's Case, 131 Mass. 376, 41 Am. Rep. 239. The inferences are to the contrary, and in favor of an intention on the part of the lawmakers to keep within constitutional limits. This is elementary. Black, Interpretation of Laws, 87.

That the drainage of large tracts of wet and overflowed lands will operate beneficially to the public, there can be no serious doubt. Statutes authorizing and providing for such drains have been enacted and in force in this country for over a century, and have been sustained on various grounds. Some have been upheld where large tracts of agricultural lands have been reclaimed and made suitable for cultivation, independent of any effect the drainage of such lands might have upon the public health; it being held in those cases that draining considerable portions of the public domain, and benefiting all lands through which the drain may pass, and others adjacent, perhaps, is a public benefit, within the meaning of the exercise no intelligent judgment until they know the plan; and, if they are entitled to no voice in the matter, they may make effective opposition in case the plan is defective. Again, they have a right to have the plans fixed so that no departure shall be effected during the progress of the improvement.

The choice of the mode of drainage of a particular district of a village or city is within the legislative discretion of the corporate authorities thereof, with which the courts will not interfere unless it has been clearly abused; and the fact that a particular tract of land within that district is somewhat higher than the adjoining lands thereof, and could have been drained by the ordinary "gravity system," is no evidence of such abuse, where the system adopted appeared to be that best adapted to the drainage of the whole district, and does not lessen the benefits such lands will receive by the construction of the sewer, and therefore cannot affect the amount of its assessment. McChesney v. Hyde Park (Ill.) 28 N. E. 1102, 151 Ill. 634, 37 N. E. 858.

Where a system of sewerage of the ordinary kind cannot be used to advantage for want of sufficient fall to carry away the contents of the mains and pipes by the force of gravitation, a municipal corporation, under a grant of power in its charter to construct main drains, sewers, etc., without any limitation or restriction as to the mode in which they shall be built or operated, has the power to construct pumping works, to be used as a necessary part of the plan adopted by the municipal authorities for the carrying away of the sewage. Drexel v. Lake, 127 Ill. 54, 20 N. E. 38.

The discretion of a city in regard to the mode of constructing sewers will not be interfered with by injunction, when it is acting within the scope of the authority vested in it by the legislature. Bell v. Rochester, 61 N. Y. S. R. 721, 30 N. Y. Supp. 365.

A temporary injunction will not be granted to restrain the exercise by county commissioners of their judgment as to the sufficiency of the size of a ditch for drainage purposes,—especially where there is an adequate remedy at law, in view of a provision giving such commissioners authority to alter, widen, or deepen any ditch or drain. Vornholt v. Gordon, 30 Ohio L. J. 33.

The plan for the construction of a sewer is not shown to be defective by the fact that the city engineers expect that there will be some injury to sidewalks and stoops from its construction. Uppington v. New York, 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L. R. A. 550, 59 N. E. 91.

Statutes authorizing municipal authorities to provide for common sewers, and to take and divert the water of a stream within the city and devote the same to sewerage purposes, may be complied with by erecting a single structure so as to render one who enters his private sewer into the resulting structure liable to pay his proportionate part of the expense of construction as provided by statute requiring the payment of expense of sewers. Gray v. Boston, 139 Mass. 328, 31 N. E. 734.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation providing for the construction of a sewer and pumping works to be used in connection therewith, the latter being an essential and integral part of the system adopted and necessary in order that the former may be made to serve its proper purpose, and providing for the levy of a special assessment to defray the expenses of the combined improvement, is not invalid as providing for two distinct improvements, or as being double. Drexel v. Lake, 127 Ill. 54, 20 N. E. 38.

A municipal corporation vested with legislative judgment in causing sewers of all kinds to be constructed or reconstructed can adopt a system of sewerage for each sewer district; and, in doing so, can determine the location of the main, as distinguished from merely local or lateral sewers, so that, whether a main sewer or a merely local or lateral one is necessary on a particular street or portion of a street, is a question vested exclusively in the council, and not reviewable except under extraordinary circumstances. Oil City v. Oil City Boiler Works, 152 Pa. 348, 25 Atl. 549; Philadelphia v. Thomas, 152 Pa. 494, 25 Atl. 873.

The owner of land sought to be taken for a sewer outlet cannot attack the determination of the trustees of a village as to the system of sewerage to be adopted on the ground that some other system would be better, where, by statute, the trustees are empowered to adopt and establish a permanent system of waterworks, subject to the approval of the state board of health, which was secured. Re Long, 34 N. Y. S. R. 778, 12 N. Y. Supp. 230.

But an ordinance for the construction of a box sewer 2 miles long, with no provision for intermediate openings between the beginning and terminating points, so as to drain the adjacent lands lying on each side, and falling to designate the territory to be drained, is void, both because deficient in description, and because unreasonable: being an attempt to assess the contiguous property without making provisions necessary to effect a drainage of their property.

law. While the element of public health is often made an important factor in the consideration of statutes of this kind, it is believed that any public benefit, such as the improvement of highways, or the reclamation of large tracts of otherwise waste lands, is sufficient to support and sustain them. Cases on this subject are Coomes v. Burt, 22 Pick. 422; Wright v. Boston, 9 Cush. 241; Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass. 489, 15 Am. Rep. 39; French v. Kirkland, 1 Paige, 117; People ex rel. Griffin v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 438, 55 Am. Dec. 286; O'Reiley v. Kankakee Valley Draining Co. 32 Ind. 169; State ex rel. Holts v. Henry County, 41 Ohio St. 423; Re Drainage between Lower Chatham & Little Falls, 35 N. J. L. 497; Wurts v. Hoagland, 114 U. S. 606, 29 L. ed. 229, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1086; Head v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 113 U. S. 20, 28 L. ed. 889, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 441;

Hyde Park v. Carton, 132 Ill. 100, 23 N. E. 500.

In adopting a plan for a ditch under Minn. Laws 1883, chap. 103, both the owners and the board exercise quasi judicial functions; and the county will not be liable for damages caused by a defect or want of efficiency in the plan of a drain adopted. Thompson v. Polk County, 38 Minn. 130, 36 N. W. 287.

2. Choice of route.

Of course, a practicable route must be chosen, but considerable latitude of choice rests with the authorities.

The practicability of a drain, within a statutory requirement thereof, means, not the best route, but the construction of a ditch having a sufficient fall, a proper course and direction, and a sufficient outlet to drain the lands proposed, which can be constructed without serious difficulty, and which, when constructed, will perform the office of a ditch throughout the route. Thomas v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 449.

The question as to whether or not a proposed drain is located upon the best and cheapest and most available route, and as to whether or not it is practicable to construct it without affecting the lands of others, being left by the drainage law to the judgment of the commissioners, their decision, in the absence of fraud, is final, and cannot be reviewed upon a remonstrance filed by affected land owners. Anderson v. Baker, 98 Ind. 587.

Whether it is practicable or expedient to construct a ditch upon the route proposed is a matter to be determined by the officers to whom the statutory authority to locate ditches is intrusted, and their determination is not reviewable by the court. Zigler v. Menges, 121 Ind. 99, 22 N. E. 782.

It is necessary, in a proceeding to establish a drainage ditch, under Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 89, art. 1, requiring that the board of commissioners find that the route of the improvement proposed is the best route, that such finding be entered on its journal, since the finding is jurisdictional. State ex rel. Union P. R. Co. v. Colfax County, 51 Neb. 28, 70 N. W. 500.

When the freeholders, pursuant to the statute (Rev. Stat. 731), lay out a ditch or drain, they are the sole judges, not alone of the necessity and reasonableness of it, but of its location, and their return is conclusive for at least a year, and cannot be set aside, save for manifest bias or corruption, upon testimony of those who differ in judgment; but it is essential to 60 L. R. A.

10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 226; 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 188. The same doctrine is applied to the interpretation of statutes providing for the condemnation of private property for the construction of ditches through which to conduct water for the purpose of irrigating arid lands, and thus adapt them to agricultural purposes. Long, Irrigation, 35-62, and cases cited; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1084.

We are required to take judicial notice of the topography of all sections of the state, and, by doing so, find that the so-called Red River Valley, comprising, for the most part, Clay, Norman, Polk, Red Lake, Marshall, and Kittson counties, is flat, level prairie, and, for the want of natural drainage, is wet and swampy during the greater portion of each year; and, in the absence of artificial drainage, large tracts of land therein are the jurisdiction of the freeholders that the person through whose land the drain is made should have refused to join in the work, or to permit it to be done. Stout v. Hopewell, 25 N. J. L. 202.

Evidence to show the practicability of another route than that fixed by the viewers is inadmissible in a proceeding to establish a ditch under a statute intrusting to viewers the selection of the route of the ditch, as their action, in the absence of fraud or a gross abuse of discretion, will not be reviewed by the courts. Wilson v. Talley, 144 Ind. 74, 42 N. E. 362, 1009.

The condemnation of land for city sewer purposes cannot be defeated on the ground that the location of the sewer is not the most compatible with the greatest public good and least private injury, in the absence of clear and convincing proof to that effect by those who alleged the same, since it is to be presumed that the state, or its agent, which the person making the condemnation is by statute declared to be, has made the best possible choice in the selection of such location. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

Trustees are not restricted to the course of the natural flow of the surface water in the location of ditches. Miller v. Weber, 1 Ohio C. D. 77, 1 Ohio C. C. 130.

The mere fact that the route of a drainage ditch intersects one or more natural water basins or small lakes does not invalidate the proceeding. Goodrich v. Stangland, 155 Ind. 279, 58 N. E. 148.

The fact that a proposed ditch is over the line of a ditch previously established and constructed is not a bar to the proceedings establishing the new ditch. Rogers v. Venis, 137 Ind. 221, 36 N. E. 841.

An injunction will not be granted to restrain the board of county commissioners from constructing a ditch for the reason that a part of the line is over and along the line of an established township ditch. Miller v. Logan County, 3 Ohio C. C. 617.

There is no constitutional or statutory inhibition against locating and constructing a new public drain along and upon an old one. Landowners assessed for the construction of the former ditch did not thereby acquire vested rights that will prevent the location and construction of another ditch upon the same line. Meranda v. Spurlin, 100 Ind. 380.

A public sewer may, with the owner's consent, be constructed across the course of a tidal creek, which, under grant from the state, had become private property, the mouth of wholly unfit and unsuited for agricultural or other purposes, but, when properly drained, are most valuable and productive. There are undoubtedly other portions of the state where similar conditions exist in a lesser degree, but we refer to the Red River Valley section as the most conspicuous and prominent. Clearly, the reclamation of these lands by a system of drainage will inure to the public good, not only by rendering them suitable for agricultural purposes, but will also very naturally benefit the public health. There can be no doubt as to the constitutionality of statutes enacted for that purpose. Counsel do not contend to the contrary. Their contention is that the act under consideration was not designed or intended for the public health, convenience, or welfare, but to enable private parties to further private interests at the expense of their neighbors. This contention is based upon what we believe to be a too strict construction of the statute. It is true that there is no express declaration therein that it was enacted in the interests of the public welfare, but this omission is not necessarily fatal to its validity. The statute must be construed in the light of all its provisions, and in harmony with pre-existing legislation on the subject. Black, Interpretation of Laws, 62. Statutes are seldom drawn with minute particularity, and unintentional omissions and apparent oversights are supplied by implication and intentment by the courts. In cases of imperfectly drawn statutes, the courts, rather than pronounce them unconstitutional and void, will draw inferences from the evident intent of the legislature, as gathered from the law taken as a whole, supplying technical inaccuracies which has been closed so as to destroy its utility, so that the taxpayers cannot defeat the assessment to pay for the sewer. Herbert v. Bayonne, 63 N. J. L. 532, 42 Atl. 833, Affirmed in 64 N. J. L. 548, 46 Atl. 608.

A special tax bill for the construction of a sewer is not invalidated by reason of the fact that it was built on private property, where it was so constructed with the consent of the owner of the property, as he would be estopped from afterwards disturbing it. St. Joseph use of Saxton Nat. Bank v. Landis, 54 Mo. App. 315.

A court of equity will not enjoin the payment of tax bills issued to the contractor, until a proper proportion of such bills are paid or tendered, where such contractor at great expense has constructed a sewer in full compliance with plans, specifications, and plats furnished, and under immediate direction and supervision of the authorized engineer, and the work has been accepted by the city, but which sewer, by mistake of the city authorities, wrongfully crosses private property, although the sewer may be useless until it is lawfully connected with a proper outlet, which can be done at an inconsiderable expense. The proper portion of such tax would be the contract price for all the work less the cost of that part extending through the private property. Johnson v. Duer, 115 Mo. 366, 21 S. W. 800.

It cannot be presumed that married women possessed of property in legal right consented to the use of such property in constructing a public sewer, under the rule that every presumption, fairly raised, will be indulged, and all reasonable equities applied, in favor of a tax levied for the construction of a sewer already built. Ibid.

Although a statute prohibits the running of a sewer diagonally through property when it is practicable to construct it parallel to one of the exterior lines of the property, and the building of it through private property if it is practicable to construct it along a street, a strong case should be presented to justify the courts in interfering with the judgment of the municipal authorities upon that question. Joplin Consol. Mfn. Co. v. Joplin, 124 Mo. 129, 27 S. W. 406.

The question as to whether or not a proposed drain, sought to be established under the law, may be constructed in a better and cheaper manner upon the lands of the petitioner and without affecting the lands of others, does not determine the public or private character of the work, and is not jurisdictional. Anderson v. Baker, 93 Ind. 587.

the construction of a sewer is not invalid because it does not provide for obtaining the right to open the same in a branch or ravine which is on private property, and an assessment levied thereunder is valid. It is immaterial whether such right is obtained before or after the passage of the ordinance and making of the assessment. Payne v. South Springfield, 161 Ill. 285, 44 N. E. 105.

The fact that an ordinance of a municipal corporation for a sewer provides for an outlet by a ditch running over private property is no reason, in a proceeding to confirm a special assessment for the cost of constructing such sewer, for declaring the ordinance void; although it might be a reason for enjoining proceedings thereunder until the right to use the ground over which the ditch passes is obtained by condemnation or otherwise. Burhans v. Norwood Park, 138 Ill. 147, 27 N. E. 1088.

But an ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer is insufficient as a basis for a special assessment, where it provides for the location of the sewer in a designated street which does not exist, but is private property. Dempster v. Chicago, 175 Ill. 278, 51 N. E. 710.

Commissioners have no jurisdiction to lay out a drainage ditch over a ditch already cut by an adjoining proprietor, and assess damages for the right of way, as the Oregon statute providing therefor contemplates such action only for the construction of a new ditch where there is none; but in such case the owner is to be compensated under another provision of such statute giving compensation by way of contribution for the tapping of his ditch, in proportion to the mutual benefits derived from its use in draining their lands. Seely v. Sebastian, 4 Or. 25.

A county commissioner has no right to locate a ditch on private land for the improvement of a highway, unless suitable drainage cannot be made in the roadway at the same expense, in which event demand must first be made of the owner and an opportunity be given him to point out a location therefor, which must be accepted if accessible and suitable, and he himself, can make the location only when the owner fails to do so or makes an unsuitable one, under a statute giving him authority, whenever necessary to construct, repair, or preserve a highway, to enter private land and take material therefrom or locate a ditch, etc., thereon without first assessing and tendering the damages, in view of the further provisions of the statute that entries shall not be made when drainage can be made on the roadway at no in expression, and obviously unintentional mistakes and omissions by implication, from the necessity of making them operative and effectual as to specific things which are included in the broad and comprehensive terms and purposes of the law; and these inferences and implications are as much a part of the law as what is distinctly expressed therein. People v. Budd, 117 N. Y. 13, 5 L. R. A. 559, 22 N. E. 670, 682; Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 241, 91 Am. Dec. 577; Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 334-337. In Winters v. Duluth, 82 Minn. 127, 84 N. W. 788, the court said: Statutes must be construed so as to give effect to the evident legislative intent, even if the result seems contrary to rules of construction and the strict letter of the statute. In Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417, the court had under consideration a statute similar to that here involved, in which there was the same omission to declare the public purpose of the act; but the court construed it to be in the interests of the public welfare, from a consideration of the provisions of the entire act. The whole act was taken together, and held to have been enacted for the public good. The opinion in that case is a very instructive one, and worthy of a careful reading. Authorities in this line might be multiplied, but it is unnecessary. From a very careful and painstaking examination of this act, we are satisfied that but one construction should, within these rules, be given it, and that to the effect that the legislature intended to provide exclusively for the public welfare. It provides that the county commissioners may construct a ditch or drain when they find the necessity therefor, and that the other provisions of the act have greater cost, or material can be obtained thereon, and that in all cases demand shall first be made before entering upon an owner's land, and, if he refuses to assent, the commissioner shall notify him of his intention to enter and point out the land to be occupied or the material to be taken; but, if he assents, "he may point out the material and the location from which it is to be taken, and if accessible and fit for the purpose intended, it shall be there taken;" the last clause, taken in connection with the other provisions of the statute, not limiting the owner's right of location merely to material taken, but applying to the taking of the land for the construction of ditches as well. Cauble v. Hultz, 118 Ind. 13, 20 N. E. 515.

A landowner may enjoin the construction by a county supervisor of a ditch in a certain location on his land for the drainage of a highway if irreparable injury will result thereby, where it is his duty, under the statute, to construct such ditch upon a roadway if proper drainage can thereby be acquired at no greater cost, but, if not, to accept that location for the ditch pointed out by the landowner if the same is acceptable and suitable, and the only questions to be determined are, whether proper drainage can be had in the highway, and whether the location pointed out by the owner is acceptable and suitable. A determination of these questions is for the court, and not for the supervisor, although no provision is made in the statute for a determination of such questions upon appeal. Ibid.

The fact that, for the purpose of draining a highway, drains are constructed on adjacent private property will not prevent the inclusion of their cost in the highway assessment, if it does not appear that the owners of the property objected thereto, where the construction was open and notorious, and has existed for a number of years, and the municipality could have obtained title to the land in case the owners objected. Moore v. Albany, 98 N. Y. 396.

Where a statute prohibits the construction of water courses along the side of a highway so as to incommode abutting property owners, and gives a remedy therefor by complaint to the selectmen, an action will not lie on behalf of a landowner against the surveyor who caused the injury: since, in the absence of the statute, the surveyor would have had the right to make such improvement in the highway as the public convenience required without liability to the abutting property owner. Elder v. Bemis, 2 Met. 599.

The legislature has the power to enact a law providing for the deepening, widening, and 60 L. R. A.

straightening of a natural stream for drainage purposes. Lipes v. Hand, 104 Ind. 503, 1 N. E. 871, 4 N. E. 160.

No jurisdiction is conferred, in a proceeding to establish a ditch, to alter and change the channel of a water course, unless it is a method of drainage and merely incident thereto, under a provision of the drainage act authorizing the court to determine that the method of drainage may be by removing obstructions from a water course, by deepening, widening, straightening, or changing its channel, etc.,—especially where a later statute confers upon another body the exclusive jurisdiction to straighten or change water courses to protect the banks of the stream where such change is the primary object to be accomplished. Scruggs v. Reese, 128 Ind. 399, 27 N. E. 748.

That a proposed drain is to be constructed for 19 miles along the line of an existing water course, which is to be straightened, widened, and deepened, does not render the work an internal improvement forbidden by the Constitution. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233.

Equity will not restrain the erection of a sewer over a private water course polluted with sewage, when the work is urgently demanded for the protection of the public health, and the intention of the municipal corporation to appropriate the private property is evident, as the municipal power of taxation is sufficient security for payment of damages. Bromley v. Philadelphia, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 600.

Under a petition to lay out a drain along the general course of a creek, the commissioner may include portions of it, and deepen, widen, or straighten the same, where the statute provides that, in cases where a natural water course shall need cleaning out, deepening, or widening, where no proceedings have been had previously to establish such water course, it shall be immaterial whether the first proceedings shall be to clean or lay out, deepen or widen; but the commissioner shall take such steps as may be necessary to obtain a right of way, and go on with his proceedings in the manner provided by law. Hausser v. Burbank, 117 Mich. 463, 76 N. W. 100.

No additional easement is imposed by the arching over of a natural water course by a municipal corporation which had previously used it as a channel for carrying off surface water. Calling the drain a sewer after it is arched over does not change the nature of the easement. Jeannette v. Eschallier, 7 Pa. Dist. R. 268.

The fact that drainage commissioners have availed themselves of the benefits derived from been complied with. It provides that the petition shall state the necessity for the ditch, and this must necessarily refer to and mean the public necessity, for only public ditches are authorized to be laid out by the act. No assessments upon lands benefited can be made, except toward the payment of a public ditch; and the theory that a private ditch may be ordered constructed under its provisions is impliedly negated by almost every section of the statute. Section 31 was undoubtedly embodied therein for the very purpose of indicating that the legislature intended it to apply exclusively to cases where the public health, convenience, or welfare will be advanced. This section provides: "This act shall be liberally construed, so as to promote the public health and the drainage and reclamation of wet and overflowed lands." It was not in the power of the legislature to provide for a drainage system in the interests of individuals for private advantage and gain, and we are bound to assume that the legislature had that legal proposition in mind in enacting this statute. It is not important that proceedings under the statute are commenced on petition by one or more private citizens; nor is it controlling, by any means, that private interests are advanced and promoted; nor need any considerable portion of the community be directly benefited by the proposed improvement. Lien v. Norman County, 80 Minn. 58, 82 N. W. 1004; Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 417; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1063; Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. v. Porter, 43 Minn. 527, 46 N. W. 75. The proceedings are conducted by public officials of the county, who are under oath to perform their duties impartially. The ditch, the removal of a dam in a creek will not estop them from denying the validity of the contract entered into between them and the owner of such dam for its removal, which is void as exceeding the power and authority of the commissioners, where the owners of the land within the district are not estopped from denying the right of such owner to a judgment against the drainage district based upon such contract. Badger v. Inlet Drainage Dist. 141 Ill. 540, 81 N. E. 170, Affirming 42 Ill. App. 79.

3. Lack of outlet.

It is within the jurisdiction of a drain commissioner to determine what the outlet of a drain shall be. Gillison v. Cressman, 100 Mich. 591, 59 N. W. 321.

The fact that an outlet for a sewer as provided in the ordinance will prove insufficient is not sufficient to invalidate the ordinance or defeat the right to levy assessments for the construction of the sewer. Bickerdike v. Chicago, 185 Ill. 280, 56 N. E. 1096.

Whether or not a "proper" outlet has been provided for a proposed sewer is a matter left to the discretion of the village authorities, with which the court will not interfere by injunction restraining the construction of the sewer, unless such discretion has been grossly abused. Johnson v. Avondale, 1 Ohio C. C. 229.

A municipal board has the power to contract for the construction of a sewer, although it has no outlet except through a plan or system of which it is a part but which cannot be completed; since it is open to the board to adopt plans to dispose of the sewage in some other mode, and it may gather it for that purpose. Harney v. Benson, 113 Cal. 814, 45 Pac. 687.

A district sewer connected with a private one is improperly constructed, and a special tax bill issued for the work done thereon is invalid, under a charter provision declaring that district sewers must connect with a public sewer or some natural course of drainage. Heman v. Payne, 27 Mo. App. 481; Kansas City use of Enright v. Ratekin, 30 Mo. App. 416.

A drainage district may not appropriate a natural water course within the limits of a city which had been previously appropriated and improved by the city for a drainage outlet. Bishop v. People, 200 Ill. 33, 65 N. E. 421.

Under a drainage act authorizing the county court to empower the owners of land to drain them across the lands of adjoining proprietors, the court has no authority to authorize the drainage in such a manner that it will be deposited and remain on the lands of such adjoining owners. French v. White, 24 Conn. 170.

Under a municipal charter declaring that district sewers shall connect with a public sewer or other district sewer, or with the natural course of drainage, an ordinance was invalid where it provided for the construction of a sewer to empty into the bed of a creek which had become filled up and obstructed so that it was a mere pond without an outlet; and special tax bills for work done under the ordinance could not be enforced. Kansas use of Frear Stone & Pipe Mfg. Co. v. Swope, 79 Mo. 446.

Under a charter provision requiring that district sewers must connect with a public sewer or another district sewer, or with the natural course of drainage, the municipality cannot construct a district sewer to connect with any natural course of drainage it may select, but it must connect with the natural course of drainage constituting the base or basis of some part of its sewer system; and a connection at a point about two blocks removed from a public sewer, with a stream or ravine which flows in the same general direction as the public sewer and empties into the same stream several hundred feet away, is improper, as the public sewer is the proper base for that part of the sewer system. Bayha v. Taylor, 36 Mo. App. 427.

A charter provision that a district sewer shall connect with another district sewer, public sewer, or natural course of drainage, is a substantial matter, and must be followed in an ordinance establishing a sewer, or the cost of such sewer cannot be enforced by local assessment. Johnson v. Duer, 115 Mo. 366, 21 S. W. 800.

Where an ordinance under which a district sewer was constructed was void by reason of its providing for the connection of the sewer with a stream not constituting a natural course of drainage, the special tax bills issued thereon are not rendered valid by the subsequent connection of the district sewer with a public one. Bayha v. Taylor, 36 Mo. App. 427.

It need not appear on the face of an ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer that it will connect with another sewer or natural course of drainage as prescribed by statute, if the provisions of the ordinance do in fact so connect it. St. Joseph v. Wilshire, 47 Mo. App. 125.

An assessment for the construction of a sewer is not invalid because such sewer originally terminated in a certain street and did not afford when constructed, is not turned over to, or placed under the control of, individuals, but remains in the charge of the public authorities. The township supervisors are expressly required by the terms of the act to keep them in repair and free from obstructions, and it is made a misdemeanor for any person or persons in any way to obstruct or damage the same. This shows with reasonable certainty that the legislature had in mind the public welfare, rather than private interests. It is possible that the literal language of the statute may permit, reading it strictly, of a construction such as contended for by relators; but the rule applied in Stewart v. Great Northern R. Co. 85 Minn. 515, sub nom. Re Stewart, 33 L. R. A. 427, 68 N. W. 208, should be applied. The court there construed the general statutes authorizing elevator companies to condemn an elevator site upon the right of way of any railway company, and it was strenuously contended that the statute under which proceedings there were instituted permitted the condemnation of such a site for a purely private use and purpose. The court, in disposing of the contention, said (and the remark is pertinent to the case at bar), "Where one construction of a statute will make it void for conflict with the Constitution, and another would render it valid, the latter, if not a forced and unreasonable one, will be adopted, although the former, at first view, is otherwise the more natural interpretation of the language used." To hold that the legislature intended by the enactment of the statute under consideration to further public interests is not a forced or unreasonable construction of the law, though, at first view, a contrary intent might seem a proper outlet, where at the time such improvement was determined upon, the ultimate extension thereof to a river was contemplated, and such extension was made within a year so as to afford a proper outlet. Wilson v. Cincinnati, 5 Ohio N. P. 68.

It is no defense to a levy of a special assessment upon contiguous lands for the construction of a sewer within a municipal corporation that the system adopted requires such drainage to be discharged into a lake, and is against public policy. The question as to whether the lands and lots of the city shall be drained, and how and when it shall be done, are within the legislative discretion of the city authorities. Rich v. Chicago, 152 Ill. 18, 38 N. E. 255.

The fact that a sewer built by a municipality discharges into a private stream, however it may affect the rights of the proprietors of that stream, does not relieve a person assessed for the construction of the sewer from liability on the assessment. Cone v. Hartford, 28 Conn. 303.

The owner of a private property in a drainage district has no such vested property right in the sewers of the district as to entitle him to claim protection of a court of chancery, by injunction, to prevent one outside of the district from connecting drains from his premises with the district sewers under a license from the corporate authorities of the district, merely because he has paid special assessments for the cost of such sewers, in the absence of any showing that his private property, or the sewers for which he has been assessed as a special benefit, will certainly be materially diminished in value by reason of the connection. Springer v. Walters, 139 Ill. 419, 28 N. E. 761, Affirming 37 Ill. App. 326.

Under a municipal charter providing that district sewers shall connect with a public sewer or other natural source of drainage, an ordinance authorizing the construction of a district sewer is not invalid by reason of its authorizing a connection with a district sewer, where such sewer connects directly with a public sewer, and is of ample capacity for such purpose. Eyerman v. Blaksley, 78 Mo. 145.

In the absence of statutory liability, one drainage district is not under legal obligation to contribute towards or pay the cost of enlarging the ditches of a lower district so as to afford an outlet for the increased flow therein caused by the connection of the ditches of the other therewith, where the ditches of both districts are located in the same natural depression, or regular channel, known as a slough, and the lands in the first-named district are the 60 L. R. A.

upper or dominant lands, and the lands of the other the lower or servient lands; the effect of such connection by the upper district being, not to change the natural flow of the surface water, but to increase its flow in the regular channel in which it was accustomed to flow before. Kankakee Drainage Dist. v. Lake Fork Special Drainage Comrs. 130 Ill. 261, 22 N. E. 607, Reversing 29 Ill. App. 86.

Under a statute authorizing inclosure commissioners to drain lands in their district, they are not authorized to alter the drains so as to overload an ancient drain flowing through lands outside their district. Dawson v. Paver, 5 Hare, 415, 16 L. J. Ch. N. S. 274, 11 Jur. 766.

County commissioners have no authority to construct a ditch beyond the boundaries of their own county, in the absence of a clear and unmistakable grant of such right by the legislature; and jurisdiction for that purpose cannot be conferred by the mere waiver or voluntary entry of appearance by landowners in another county. Schamp v. Kennedy, 16 Ohio C. C. 604.

A township may not extend its drainage into an adjoining township without a petition for that purpose, signed by a majority of the owners of the property to be benefited thereby in the adjoining township. Chatham Twp. v. Dover Twp. 12 Can. S. C. 321.

The Ontario drainage law providing that when a drain constructed in one municipality is used as an outlet, or will provide an outlet, for drainage from lands in another municipality, lands benefited may be assessed for their proportion of the cost, applies to drains properly so-called, and does not include original water courses that have been deepened or enlarged. Broughton v. Grey Twp. 27 Can. S. C. 495, Reversing 23 Ont. App. Rep. 801.

A section of the farm drainage act of Illinois, providing that another drainage district may connect with ditches of a drainage district upon payment of the cost of enlarging such ditches to accommodate the increased flow caused by the connection, does not apply to and impose such burden upon a connecting drainage district formed under another and wholly independent drainage act, but is confined to drainage districts formed under that act, by virtue of a clause therein providing that such act shall not affect other independent drainage laws, but shall apply only to such districts as are provided for in that act. Kankakee Drainage Dist. v. Lake Fork Special Drainage Comrs. 130 Ill. 261, 22 N. E. 607.

its more natural interpretation. As said, in substance, in Curryer v. Merrill, 25 Minn. 1, 33 Am. Rep. 450, as a sequence it logically follows that every statute duly passed by the legislature is presumably valid, and this presumption is conclusive unless it affirmatively appears to be in conflict with some provision of the Constitution; and, in order to justify a court in pronouncing it invalid, its repugnancy with the Constitution "must be so clear, plain, and palpable as to leave no reasonable doubt or hesitation upon the judicial mind."

It is further claimed in support of the contention that the law is unconstitutional that no provision is made therein for the determination by the board of county commissioners, or otherwise, of the question whether a proposed improvement thereunder will result beneficially to the public. As we have already noted, the question as to the propriety, wisdom, and public necessity of statutes of this kind is one exclusively for the legislature to determine; but the question whether a particular improvement under such a statute will promote the public health, convenience, or welfare is one of law, which is beyond the power of the legislature to determine to the exclusion of the courts. And if it be essential to the validity of any such statute that provision be made for the determination of that question, we have to determine whether this act makes such provision, and casts that duty upon the board of county commissioners. We are of opinion that, fairly construed, and invoking the rule as to implications and intensions in the construction of statutes, the board of commissioners is required to pass upon that question before final action is taken. The may, by mandamus, compel drainage commissioners so to alter the system as to provide an outlet of sufficient capacity to drain all the lands of the district, where he is taxed for the improvement, but receives no benefits therefrom by reason of the insufficient depth of the outlet provided. Under the statute the duty of the commissioners to provide outlets of ample capacity for the waters of the district is mandatory. Peotone & M. Union Drainage Dist. No. 1 v. Adams, 163 Ill. 428, 45 N. E. 266, affirming 61 Ill. App. 435.

A contention, in an action to have declared void an assessment for a branch sewer, that it is not connected with any sewer established by ordinance as a main public sewer, is of no avail when the sewer is in fact a main public sewer, and so accepted and paid for by the city council, although not established by ordinance. Akers v. Kolkmeier (Mo. App.) 71 S. W. 536.

4. Responsiveness.

If the drainage of property will cost more than the property will be worth after the improvement is completed, that fact should prevent further proceedings, and, in most instances, will do so. When, however, the making of the improvement lies in the discretion of a body not directly interested in the property, and the rule is applied that liability for the cost does not depend on the benefit (see note to Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties [Ill.] 58 L. R. A. 353), it may happen that the expense of the improvement is excessive. But in most instances all persons concerned endeavor to prevent such a result. If, however, the levying of the assessment is regarded as an exercise of the taxing power, there is no constitutional protection against it.

Evidence that, collectively, the lands affected by the construction of a public ditch were of no more value with than without the proposed drainage is inadmissible to sustain a remonstrance that the cost of the ditch exceeds the aggregate benefits, where the aggregate benefits to lands, the owners of which are making no objections to the assessment, exceed the cost of the drain. Earhart v. Farmers' Creamery, 148 Ind. 79, 47 N. E. 226.

A proceeding for condemnation of a right of way for a drain cannot be defeated on the ground that the statute authorizing it is unconstitutional because the tax for the improvement is void so far as it exceeds the benefit received, where the statute expressly provides that the benefit and cost shall be ascertained before any proceedings are taken, and that, if 60 L. R. A.

the cost exceeds the benefit, the commissioners can proceed no further with the enterprise. Redmon v. Chacey, 7 N. D. 281, 78 N. W. 1081.

A bill by a landowner to enjoin drainage commissioners from making appropriations from the general fund to construct certain subordinate ditches not necessary for the general drainage of the whole district cannot be maintained in the absence of positive allegations that such ditches are not within the original purpose for which the corporate funds may be used, so that all lands within the district shall receive their proper and equal benefits, as contemplated when the lands were classified. McFadden v. White, 81 Ill. App. 109.

An assessment for a sewer is not invalid, although the city officers have no means of ascertaining what the improvement will cost, where it does not appear that the assessment is too large, or that the authorities have acted dishonestly in the matter. Loomis v. Little Falls, 66 App. Div. 299, 72 N. Y. Supp. 774.

Pumping works and alley sewers, being adjuncts to the main sewer and necessary aids to its successful operation, are properly included as part of the cost of constructing the main sewer. McChesney v. Hyde Park, 151 Ill. 634, 37 N. E. 858.

Attorneys' fees cannot be assessed, taxed up, and collected as a part of the expenses of the location or construction of a ditch from the landowners affected, in the absence of a statutory provision therefor in the law authorizing the ditch. Kersey v. Turner, 99 Ind. 257.

b. Necessity of designating.

1. In general.

The proceedings for the establishment of a drain are usually required to designate the plans, route, specifications, estimates, and all other matters necessary to distinguish the particular improvement contemplated, and to give persons whose property will be taken, or who will be taxed for it, all information which they may require in forming an intelligent judgment as to what attitude to assume towards the improvement.

To entitle Jersey City to build a sewer, a plan of it must first be made and adopted by resolution of the board of aldermen, approved by the mayor, and the notice to landowners to appear and be heard in objection, while not required to take any particular form, must be sufficiently definite to inform them of the nature and extent of the proposed work. State, Coar, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 35 N. J. L. 404.

statute provides for filing with the county auditor a petition for the location of a proposed ditch, upon the filing of which that official is required to give notice, by publishing and posting the same, to all interested parties, of a time and place "of hearing to be had thereon." At the hearing the board must determine whether to entertain the petition. If entertained, they are required to appoint a civil engineer, whose duty it is to make a survey of the proposed ditch, reporting the same to the board. Whereupon viewers are to be appointed, who, in turn, examine the route of the proposed ditch, estimate the damages and benefits to accrue from its construction, and report the same to the board. After all these preliminary steps are taken, a second notice of hearing is provided for, giving therein a time and place of hearing upon the petition, at which, the statute provides, the board shall "proceed to hear and consider the same, and all persons interested may appear and be heard by and before them." It will be observed that two hearings are required to be had,—one at the time of filing the petition, and one following the report of the viewers; and the question presented is whether it is the duty of the board to determine at either that the proposed ditch, if constructed, will promote the public interests. All parties interested are thus afforded an opportunity to appear and be heard; and manifestly the hearing must be had on all questions pertinent to the pending proceedings, and particularly the controlling question whether the relief prayed for may, under the Constitution and laws of the state, be granted. If this were not so, and the legislature did not contemplate such a hearing, then the provi-

An order establishing a sewer must be reasonably definite when made, as important rights of the parties are then fixed. Sheehan v. Fitchburg, 131 Mass. 523.

An indefinite order for the laying out of a sewer cannot be aided by subsequent plans made at the time of construction. Ibid.

But a sewer assessment is not invalidated by mere failure of municipal authorities to comply with provisions of the ordinance as to making and recording plans of the improvement which had no relation to the assessment. Kelso v. Boston, 120 Mass. 297.

Substantial compliance of the ordinance with a statute requiring the specification of the nature, character, locality, and description of a sewer improvement to render the assessment valid is sufficient. Pearce v. Hyde Park, 126 Ill. 287, 18 N. E. 824.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer is not rendered uncertain by reason of the caption failing to state that its purpose in part was to provide for house connections with the sewer. The sewer catch-basins, manholes, and house connections are all parts of one improvement. Hinsdale v. Shannon, 182 Ill. 312, 55 N. E. 327.

The order of the probate court establishing a drain should describe the lands belonging to the several owners respectively, so that the special commissioners may value the premises. Bennett v. Olney, 56 Mich. 634, 23 N. W. 449.

The statutory requirements as to the acts to be done by commissioners in constructing sewers, such as the filing of plans and specifications of the work, must be complied with before an assessment can be made upon abutting property for the cost of it. Kneeland v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 412.

An assessment for the construction of sewers and other work, including cribbing, manholes, and flush tank, is void, when the description in the resolution of intention is insufficient as to the dimensions, nature, and character of the work and the materials to be used. McDonnell v. Gillon, 134 Cal. 329, 66 Pac. 314.

A statute of Illinois vesting corporate authorities of cities with power to construct drains contemplates that such drains will be constructed for the purpose of draining lands within their corporate limits, and an ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer by special assessment cannot correctly specify its nature and character, as required by statute, without designating in some way the territory to be drained, and making such reasonable provisions as are necessary to effect such drainage. Hyde Park v. Carton, 132 Ill. 100, 23 N. E. 590.

Mere clerical errors in the plans under which sewers are constructed will not defeat the assessments therefor, if the work is done in substantial conformity to the ordinance and to the intention of the parties. Eyermaun v. Provenchere, 15 Mo. App. 256.

The word "fall," in a clause of an ordinance specifying the location and construction of a sewer, will be construed to mean "rise," where the effect of a literal interpretation would be the construction of a sewer with the outlet higher than the starting point, and it is evident from other sections of the ordinance and from the plans and specifications that the latter word was intended. Steele v. River Forest, 141 Ill. 302, 30 N. E. 1034.

2. Estimates of cost.

Failure to observe a charter provision requiring a detailed estimate of the cost of a sewer to be obtained before proceeding with the work renders the proceedings void, and the assessment levied for the sewer illegal. Mills v. Detroit, 95 Mich. 422, 54 N. W. 897.

A contract for a sewer, executed by a municipal corporation before an estimate has been made of the probable expense of the work, is invalid, so that no charge can be created against abutting property thereunder. People ex rel. Moore, v. New York, 5 Barb. 43.

A provision in a ditching law authorizing persons desiring to make application under an act for the construction of a ditch to employ an engineer to enter upon such lands, over which the proposed ditch is to run, as may be necessary to make a survey and schedule and an estimate of the cost of construction, does not require the making of such survey and estimate before the making of the application, unless the same is necessary to state the facts required to be contained therein. Slusser v. Ransom, 39 Ind. 506.

A provision of a city charter limiting the cost of an improvement to the amount of the appropriation made therefor which was based upon the estimate made at the time of the adoption of the ordinance authorizing the work applies only to improvements paid for out of the city treasury, and not to those paid by a special tax against the property benefited. Hill v. Swingle, 159 Mo. 45, 80 S. W. 114.

A judgment confirming a special assessment levied upon land in a drainage district cannot be attacked in a proceeding to foreclose the lien for the unpaid assessment, upon the ground that the whole assessment exceeds the estimated sion for the notice of time and place thereof becomes practically inoperative and meaningless. Clearly the lawmakers could not have been so careful in respect to requiring these notices merely for the purpose of enabling interested parties to appear and raise objections going merely to the regularity of the proceedings, for the regularity of the steps taken is of no very great importance. The notice to interested parties, affording them an opportunity to be heard on the merits of the proceedings, is the important step. The legislature had no authority to authorize the construction of a ditch, except for public purposes; the commissioners have no power to order one constructed for a private purpose; and the question whether a proposed ditch may be constructed at all depends primarily upon whether it will result in a public benefit. To authorize proceedings under the statute, therefore, that question must be determined either at the preliminary hearing upon the petition, or at the second or final hearing. While the statute does not, in express terms, require the board to determine it, the existence of the fact being essential to their authority to proceed in any case, and essential to the validity of the statute, too, the power to determine it must be implied. It is stated as a general rule in Black, Interpretation of Laws, 62, that every statute is understood to contain, by implication, if not by its express terms, all such provisions as may be necessary to effectuate its object and purpose, or to make effective the rights, powers, privileges, or jurisdiction which it grants, and also all such collateral and subsidiary consequences as may be fairly and logically inferred from its terms. An application of cost of the work and the expense of the assessment. Hammond v. People, 169 Ill. 545, 48 N. E. 573.

When the cost of a sewer draining a district lying partly in three towns is apportioned among the three, and the amount apportioned to each is assessed upon lands within that town embraced in the drainage area, if the lots are not assessed more than the value of their actual benefits, and if, also, the assessment is not improperly distributed, the fact that the estimated cost according to the drainage area proves greatly disproportionate to the actual cost according to the benefits conferred which is the method adopted and required by statute in assigning to each town the amount it is to pay, is a ground of complaint, neither of the town itself in its corporate capacity, nor of the landowners assessed. State, King, Prosecutor, v. Reed, 43 N. J. L. 186, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

Under the statutes of Illinois, a municipal corporation may pass an ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer in one of its streets, the cost thereof to be paid, one half by general tax, and one half by special taxation to be levied on the property contiguous to the improvement in proportion to the benefits accruing to the respective parcels of land along the line of the improvement by the making thereof; and it is not necessary to its validity that, before its passage, an examination shall have been made of such property and the probable benefits thereto by the construction of the sewer have been determined to be one half the cost thereof, since special taxation does not imply special benefit or any benefit, and no attention need be paid thereto, after that mode of taxation is adopted, further than may be paid by the city council in determining which particular one of the several modes of special taxation of contiguous property open to them shall be resorted to. This being a proceeding by special taxation, and not by special assessment, the steps required to be taken in the latter case need not be regarded. Galesburg v. Searles, 114 Ill. 217, 29 N. E. 686.

A tax for a sewer is not illegal, although neither the resolution ordering the sewer, nor the one that assesses the tax, in terms fixes the dimensions of the sewer, or names the gross amount to be paid therefor, or the amount of tax to be assessed upon each tract of land, and the owner thereof, when the resolution assessing the tax named the street through which the sewer was to be constructed and the terminal points and ordered that the tax be assessed and levied on each lot, part of lot, or tract of ground in the sum and to the amount shown by the plat of the city engineer, which plat showed the amount to be assessed to each square foot, the number of square feet in each tract of ground, and the total assessment for each tract of ground subject to be assessed for the sewer. Ditoe v. Davenport, 74 Iowa, 66, 36 N. W. 895.

3. Route.

The description of a proposed drain in the application therefor is sufficient where it approximately indicates the route and termini. Hausser v. Burbank, 117 Mich. 463, 76 N. W. 109; STATE ex rel. UTICK v. POLK COUNTY.

A petition to establish a drain sufficiently describes it where it contains a description of the line of the drain, together with a table showing the numbers of the stations and the depth and width, so that, if the line indicated be taken to mean the center line of the strip to be taken, the description is definite and certain. Anketell v. Hayward, 119 Mich. 525, 78 N. W. 557.

The description of a proposed drain to commence at a specified point upon a designated water course which is to be deepened, widened, and straightened through given sections terminating at a point indicated, sufficiently complies with a statutory provision requiring a general description of the beginning, the route, and the terminus of the drain. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233.

An omission of the name of a street throughout from the legislative proceedings for the construction of a sewer is a defect which is fatal to an assessment on the property located thereon for the construction thereof, where the descriptions of property affected by the improvement are by streets. Cincinnati v. Honnigfort, 32 Ohio L. J. 82.

A petition to lay out a township drain is sufficient where it gives the terminal points and the direction which it is to run, with the distances. Clark v. Teller, 50 Mich. 618, 16 N. W. 167.

A petition to lay out a drain is insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the drain commissioner where the course of the proposed drain is left to the determination of the commissioner. Null v. Zierle, 52 Mich. 540, 18 N. W. 348.

A description of a proposed township drain in an application therefor is too indefinite to authorize official action, where it allows the commissioner to determine the distance and direction of the drain. Frost v. Leatherman, 55 Mich. 33, 20 N. W. 705.

this rule is illustrated by the case of Woodruff v. Glendale, 26 Minn. 78, 1 N. W. 581, where the court construed Laws 1873, chap. 5, providing for the laying out of public highways. That statute authorized the town board of supervisors to open and lay out highways, upon certain provisions of the statute being complied with, and provided for the assessment of damages, but nowhere provided for the payment of the same. In speaking of this omission, the court said: "The only point made is that the act is unconstitutional because it does not provide for payment of the damages assessed. If no such provision were found in the act, of course, it would be unconstitutional. There is no express provision to that effect. But rather than hold the law to be void, the court will find such provision by implication, if the act will admit of such a construction." In the case of Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750, the court had under consideration the validity of certain ordinances of the city of Portland authorizing the construction of drains and sewers, and the assessment of private property to defray the expense thereof. The ordinances failed to provide for notice to interested parties, and it was insisted that they were unconstitutional and void, as a taking of private property without due process of law. The court held that if notice was in fact given to all interested parties, though the ordinance did not require it in express terms, there was no violation of the Constitution, and the proceedings in laying out the sewers were sustained. In the case at bar the petition for the proposed ditch distinctly alleged that its construction would benefit

An application for the establishment of a drain which gives its dimensions and describes a line between the termini, is insufficient where it fails to state which side of the line the land should be taken, or to give any data from which it can be ascertained. Bennett v. Olney, 56 Mich. 634, 23 N. W. 449.

A view taken by the jury to determine the necessity for a public ditch is defective where it does not point out the line of the ditch, or specify its dimensions, but refers to it merely by name. Chapman v. Clark, 49 Mich. 305, 13 N. W. 601.

A proceeding to lay out a public ditch will be quashed where the venire to summon the jury failed to give the dimensions of the ditch, or to indicate the line of it with any precision. Ibid.

4. Dimensions.

Proceedings to condemn land for drainage purposes, under a statute requiring commissioners to determine the route, with length and average depth, of the proposed ditch, are void where the ditch is described only as a line, without description of width or average depth, and it does not appear what specific land has been condemned, what kind of a ditch has been approved of, or on what basis the commissioners acted. Milton v. Wacker, 40 Mich. 229.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer is void for uncertainty where the only description as to the depth and grade is that "said sewer shall be laid at a proper depth and grade to give proper fall and drainage." Alton v. Middleton, 168 Ill. 442, 41 N. E. 926.

Under a charter authorizing the city council to construct sewers of such dimensions as may be prescribed by ordinance, the council cannot delegate the power thus given to determine the dimensions of a sewer; and an ordinance authorizing the construction of a sewer of such dimensions as the city engineer may deem requisite is void. St. Louis use of Murphy v. Clemens, 43 Mo. 395, Expressly Overruling St. Louis v. Oeters, 36 Mo. 456, so far as it asserts a contrary principle.

But Judge Baker held that the failure of the city council to state, either in its notice of the passage of a resolution for the construction of a sewer, or in the resolution itself, the size of the proposed sewer, as required by statute, does not deprive it of jurisdiction to order the improvement, and is not a ground for enjoining the collection of the assessment therefor. Rickards v. Hammond, 67 Fed. 380.

Under a charter authorizing the construction of public and district sewers, the former to be paid for by the city and the latter by special tax upon the property located in the district, the district sewers to be constructed upon recommendation of the board of public improvement, and to be of such dimensions as it may prescribe, the character of a sewer constructed as a district sewer and of the prescribed dimensions is not open to attack in collateral proceedings to enforce the special tax, on the ground that its main stem, being 8 feet wide, constitutes a public sewer. Heman v. Allen, 156 Mo. 534, 57 S. W. 559, Affirmed in 181 U. S. 402 b, 45 L. ed. 922, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

5. Material and openings.

An ordinance directing the construction of several sewers sufficiently conforms to a provision of the municipal charter requiring it to designate the material of which the sewers are to be constructed where it provides that the first three be made of "vitrified clay pipe," and that one of the others be a "sewer made of pipe," and that each of the remaining ones be a "pipe sewer," as it will be presumed that the council intended that they should all be of vitrified clay,—the same material as that of the first three. St. Joseph use of Saxton Nat. Bank v. Landis, 54 Mo. App. 315.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation merely providing for the construction of a sewer, without providing for its being covered so as to protect the same, and furnishing no data for an estimate of the cost of such covering, is void, and a special assessment cannot be levied under it. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Chicago, 162 Ill. 505, 44 N. E. 832.

An ordinance providing for the construction of a branch sewer in accordance with the provisions for a main sewer is sufficient as to description or dimensions and materials. Akers v. Kolkmeier (Mo. App.) 71 S. W. 536.

A municipality, in providing for the construction of a sewer, cannot delegate to the city engineer the power to determine the material out of which the sewer or its catch-basins, which form a substantial part of it, shall be constructed, as such power is a legislative one which cannot be delegated. St. Joseph v. Wilshire, 47 Mo. App. 125.

But, although an ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer improperly delegated to the city engineer power to prescribe the material out of which the manhole and catch-basins were to be made, it did not thereby deprive the contractor of the right to recover on the special the public health, convenience, and welfare; and the commissioners found the same fact in their final order, thus showing the construction the officials placed upon the statute. They understood that they could proceed only where a proposed ditch would be of public utility, and they found the fact in the final order accordingly. Of course, their construction of the statute is not final or of any particular force, but that they determined the essential question conferring upon them the right to construct the ditch brings the case within the Oregon case just cited.

It is further urged that no appeal is allowed from an order directing the construction of a ditch. This is not essential to the validity of the statute. In cases where no appeal is provided, the matter being discretionary with the legislature, certiorari or other proper remedy is open to injured parties to review the proceedings. The question of public use being a judicial one, interested parties may bring it before the court at any time, upon its appearing that the commissioners contemplate the construction of a ditch in the furtherance of private interests. Just what the precise remedy would be in such a case, we are not called upon to determine at this time. In all probability, an action would lie to restrain further proceedings on the part of the board, if the result thereof would be a taking of private property for a private use; and the question whether the ditch proposed to be constructed would promote the public health, convenience, and welfare could thus be directly presented to the courts for determination, and would not be open to the objection that the judgment or determination of the commissioners was being attacked in a col-tax bills the amount due for the construction of the sewer less the amount charged for the manhole and catch-basins, where such amount could be determined from the contract. Ibid.

An ordinance for the construction of a system of sewerage which fails to specify the nature, character, locality, and description of the manholes and catch-basins, fails to comply with the statutory requirements in that respect, and is invalid, and cannot be made the basis of special assessments. Ogden v. Lake View, 121 Ill. 422, 13 N. E. 159.

An ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer is not invalid for want of certainty in the description of the improvement, in violation of the statute authorizing such improvements to be made by special assessment, which specifies that ordinances for that purpose shall "specify therein the nature, character, locality, and description of such improvement," because it does not designate the exact spot upon the sewer where the manholes are to be constructed, and simply provides that the sewer should be constructed "with necessary manholes and inlets for surface drainage." Springfield v. Mathus, 124 Ill. 88, 16 N. E. 92; Springfield v. Sale, 127 Ill. 359, 20 N. E. 86.

The omission from an ordinance of a municipal corporation authorizing the construction of a sewer of any provision for manholes and catch-basins, will not affect its validity, as violating a statutory provision requiring such ordinance to state fully the character and nature of the improvement, where a sewer has already been constructed in the street sufficient for the purposes of conveying surface water, etc. Vane v. Evanston, 150 Ill. 616, 37 N. E. 901.

Where a municipality is required by its charter to designate by ordinance the size of sewers to be constructed by it, but the charter is silent as to inlets, manholes, etc., and as to the material of which they are to be constructed, it may regard these appendages to the sewer as matters of detail not necessary to be inserted in the ordinance. St. Joseph use of Gibson v. Owen, 110 Mo. 445, 19 S. W. 713.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation authorizing the construction of a sewer is not void for uncertainty in the location of catch-basins provided for, where they are to be located on the curb lines of the street at such points as the engineer in charge shall direct. Hinsdale v. Shannon, 182 Ill. 312, 55 N. E. 327.

The word "necessary" in an ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer "with necessary manholes and inlets for surface drainage" should be taken as a restrictive term as respects the location of the manholes, going to 60 L. R. A.

show where they should be constructed; that is, they are to be where it is necessary and proper that they should be, and is sufficient to enable a civil engineer to determine where they should be located. Springfield v. Mathus, 124 Ill. 88, 16 N. E. 92.

1. Route.

The supervisors, in laying out a ditch under the drainage law, have the right to make any variation from the line thereof, in their discretion, provided they do not so far depart from the line proposed in the petition as to make materially another and a different line. Donnelly v. Decker, 58 Wis. 461, 46 Am. Rep. 637, 17 N. W. 389.

Under the provision of N. Y. Laws 1889, chap. 375, as amended by Laws 1891, chap. 816, that, upon petition by the requisite property owners for the construction of a sewer, the board shall give notice of a hearing for and against the construction of such system, the board has power to construct a sewer only in the street named in the petition, and cannot extend it to another street. Re Drake, 69 Hun, 95, 23 N. Y. Supp. 264.

A municipal lien for the construction of a sewer cannot stand where the property abuts on the sewer as constructed, but not on the route as designated in the authorizing ordinance. Scranton City v. Kingsbury, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 555.

In an action for damages and an order of sale against land for a special assessment for the construction of a sewer conceded to have been located on a different line than that designated in the ordinance providing for its construction, the burden of proof is upon the municipal corporation to show that the location of the completed sewer is substantially the location established by the ordinance, and that the deviation has not operated to the injury of the owners of property against which the judgment is sought, and that the sewer as constructed is not less beneficial to such property than it would have been if located in literal compliance with the terms of the ordinance. Church v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 174 Ill. 366, 51 N. E. 747.

Drainage commissioners, in cutting a ditch in a drainage district, must not, after having assessed the damages a landowner will sustain thereby, make a substantial variation from the line as indicated on the plat filed in the condemnation proceedings; and if they do so equity will enjoin them, although the ditch as con-lateral proceeding. Soudder v. Jones, 134 Ind. 547, 32 N. E. 221; 7 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 222. Such an action was sustained in Northwestern Teleph. Exch. Co. v. Minneapolis, 81 Minn. 140, 53 L. R. A. 175, 83 N. W. 527, 86 N. W. 69, where the relief sought was to restrain the municipal authorities from the exercise of the police power,—far broader and more comprehensive than an exercise of the power of eminent domain,—on the ground that its threatened exercise was arbitrary and unnecessary. Upon both these propositions, in view of the importance of the case, the fact that the law has been in operation for some time, and, no doubt, many ditches and drains have been ordered constructed thereunder, and large expenses incurred in furtherance of such improvements, and the further fact that the objections to the validity of the statute go to its form, rather than to its substance, we are constrained to hold it valid, and in no way in violation of any provision of the Constitution. The result of holding otherwise, and pronouncing the statute unconstitutional, would be to nullify all proceedings had under it, invalidate debts contracted, and wipe the law from the statute books for defects and omissions not going to its substance, or to the general authority of the legislature to enact it, which defects and omissions could be remedied and cured by proper legislation, and when thus cured and remedied the statute would be a valid legislative enactment. The rights of property owners are fully protected under the law; notice and opportunity to be heard are afforded them at every step; and it being within the general power and authority of the legislature to enact such legislation, we deem it the part of wisdom to supply by application of the liberal rules of statutory construction all formal defects and technical omissions in the expression of the legislative will.

structed may not be more injurious to the land than it would have been if constructed as planned. Rutledge v. Drainage Dist. No. 6, 16 Ill. App. 655.

It is no objection to a proceeding to establish a drain that it extends beyond the line of the lands described in the original application, where the plaintiff's lands are not injured thereby, nor his taxes increased by the extension, which is paid for by the owners whose lands it crosses. Davison v. Otis, 24 Mich. 28.

One who knows of the proceedings to relocate a ditch, and takes a contract to dig it, and does dig part of it, is estopped from thereafter attacking the proceedings of the drain commissioner. People ex rel. Roediger v. Wayne County Drain Commissioner, 40 Mich. 745.

A tax levied to cover the expenses of building a drainage ditch is not invalid because a change was made in the survey originally fixed upon so that the ditch as built did not follow the original survey, if the two surveys corresponded in length and were on substantially the same line. Hutts v. Manona County, 100 Iowa, 74, 69 N. W. 284.

When the county board is required to locate a public drain ditch, the line is located with sufficient certainty when the board approves and adopts the route as defined in the petition, and some small variation of the engineer from that route cannot be said to be another route. Dodge County v. Acom, 61 Neb. 376, 85 N. W. 292.

Property owners cannot refuse to pay assessments for the construction of a sewer because it was not laid in the exact line directed by the ordinance, where no injury has resulted from the change, and the benefits are the same. People ex rel. Raymond v. Church, 192 Ill. 302, 61 N. W. 496.

The owner of a city lot cannot defeat a special assessment levied on the same by the city for the construction of a sewer in the street upon which such lot fronts, on the ground that there was a deviation in the location thereof from that provided in the ordinance authorizing such improvement, where such change does not render the sewer less beneficial to his property. Rossiter v. Lake Forest, 151 Ill. 489, 38 N. E. 359.

A deviation from the approved plans for the reclamation of swamp lands is within the discretion of the trustees of a reclamation district, where such deviation is slight, or no injury results therefrom, but, instead, such deviation is beneficial. Reclamation Dist. No. 3 v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 635, 4 Pac. 676.

A landowner is not entitled to equitable relief from a change in the line of a ditch affecting his lands, and for the construction of which a share is allotted thereto, where the change is not on his own lands, and in no way affects the drainage thereof. Cooper v. Shaw, 148 Ind. 313, 47 N. E. 679.

2. Plans.

A municipal corporation has the power to make such minor changes in the construction of a sewer as are within the general scope of the original plan and necessary to render it at all effective, although not provided for in the ordinance under which the improvement is constructed. An iron door opening outward to permit the escape of sewage into the river, but closing in case of a flood so as to prevent backwater from getting into the sewer, is included within this category. People ex rel. McCormack v. McWethy, 177 Ill. 334, 52 N. E. 479.

It is no ground for resisting payment of a ditch assessment that the ditch was not constructed according to the plans and specifications thereof, under a statute giving landowners a remedy for a variation from such plans by direct application to the court having the work in charge. Shrack v. Covault, 144 Ind. 260, 43 N. E. 229.

A drainage commissioner is liable on his bond, given for a faithful discharge of his duties in constructing a public ditch, for damages resulting from an unauthorized deviation by him from the plans and specifications according to which the work was ordered by the court to be constructed, the measure of which is the amount necessary to complete the ditch in the manner ordered. Smith v. State ex rel. Ingberman, 117 Ind. 167, 19 N. E. 744.

The question whether the commissioners of a drainage district, organized under the farm drainage act of Illinois, may lay tile deeper than proposed by the engineer's plans without entering a resolution to that effect of record, cannot be raised on appeal by a landowner from an order of court confirming a special assessment upon his land. The only question that can be raised in such case is expressly declared by such act to be whether or not such tax is in excess of the benefits to accrue. Slason v. Drainage Dist. No. 1, 163 Ill. 295, 45 N. E. 215.

It is further contended that the description of the proposed ditch, as set forth in the petition, is so indefinite and uncertain as to confer no jurisdiction upon the county commissioners. We do not concur with relators in this contention. The description of the proposed ditch, as contained in the petition, is as follows: "Commencing at a point in the southwest quarter of the southwest quarter (S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$) of section eight (8), on the northerly shore of a certain lake, lying and being in said section eight (8) and section seventeen, town of Queen, Polk county, Minn.; thence running," etc. The precise objection made to the description is that it is indefinite and uncertain as to the starting point of the proposed ditch. A petition in proper form is, no doubt, a prerequisite to the authority of the commissioners to act, but it is not necessary that the same contain an accurate description of the proposed ditch,—either of its starting point or terminus. It is sufficient if the description contained therein be approximately correct. Kinnie v. Bare, 68 Mich. 625, 36 N. W. 672. The precise location of the ditch is determined by the civil engineer, and is to be found in his report; and that this report definitely located that point and the entire course of the ditch, there is no question. Gribbs v. Benedict, 64 Ark. 555, 44 S. W. 707. The petition mentions as the starting point of the ditch a point on the shore of a certain lake in section 8, town of Queen, Polk county. It is a fact of which the court takes notice that congressional townships, when organized, are given a name by the organizing power, and a reference to the town by such name is as definite and certain as though the number of township and range were given. We find nothing in this particular contention, nor in the other points urged by relators, on which to base an order vacating or setting aside the proceedings of the commissioners.

Writ discharged.

The commissioners of a drainage district, under the drainage laws of Illinois, may change the plan for the drainage of such district as originally adopted, and upon which the lands in the district were classified, and may make a second levy of assessments, if necessary to carry out the plans as changed, without giving notice to the owners of such lands either of the change of the plans or of the second levy, where such change is necessary to effectually drain all the lands of the district as contemplated when such classification was made; and in such case they need not complete the work under the original plan before making the change. Reynolds v. Milk Grove Special Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 268, 25 N. E. 516, Affirming 34 Ill. App. 302. There is nothing in the law forbidding the change, and the drainage of the lands would be greatly embarrassed if there were no power to correct mistakes.

When legislative authority is given to a municipality to build a main sewer through certain named streets, with such laterals as the officers entrusted with the work deem necessary properly to drain the territory, all to be done according to a certain plan, there is no right to abandon such plan and follow another providing for two main sewers instead. State, Hoboken, Prosecutor, v. Chamberlain, 37 N. J. L. 51.

The statute having authorized the water commissioners in Jersey City, in executing a plan reported by them and adopted by the common council, to make such changes or alterations as may be found convenient or necessary in the progress of the work, their power in the premises is discretionary; and, where the general plan contemplates the use of an old sewer, and they decide to build a new one instead, they are the sole judges of its necessity or convenience, and the courts cannot review their decision. State, Plard, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 30 N. J. L. 148.

Sewer assessments in Jersey City, levied for a system reported by the water commissioners and adopted by the common council, providing for main sewers laid on an incline due to the difference between high and low water, connected with a canal into which water is admitted by automatic tide gates for flushing them at intervals, and discharging into the river, the plans for which comprise many details relating to laterals, and prescribing form, materials, size, estimated cost, etc., will not be avoided because the main sewer was built before the canal (the common council being entitled to designate the time of building), or because alterations were made in the grade, form, dimensions, and materials, and allowances were made to contractors for extra work beyond the specifications; or because the sewer assessed for connects with a sewer upon property already assessed and paid for, or because laterals were added not included in plan; or because of faulty, mistaken, or fraudulent construction by the contractor; or because the sewer was built through private property; or because it will not answer its expected purpose; or because of errors or omissions in the assessment roll; for the reason, that the statute empowers the commissioners to construct the canal, locks, sewers, and drains as planned, and to make all necessary or convenient changes during the progress of the work; and they also have the power to correct errors and omissions from the assessment roll, and to make an entirely new one if necessary. State, Vanderbeck, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 441; State, Plard, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 30 N. J. L. 148.

The cost of extending the point of discharge of a sewer out to the middle of a river by means of an iron pipe is not properly chargeable to the assessment fund for the construction of the sewer under an ordinance which does not provide for such extension. People ex rel. McCornack, v. McWethy, 177 Ill. 334, 52 N. E. 479.

A municipal corporation has no power to construct extra sewers and additional catch-basins not provided for in the ordinance under which a sewer is constructed, although such changes make the sewer more beneficial than the one provided for; nor is the assessment fund collected for such improvement chargeable for their cost. Ibid.

A municipal corporation has no right, after it has passed an ordinance for the construction of a sewer within defined limits and describing the real estate that will be benefited thereby, to change the character of the sewer and extend it over other territory, without making a change in the real estate to be assessed for its cost. Columbus v. Storey, 35 Ind. 97.

After a general plan for sewers has been filed for New York city under the act of 1865, additions may be made to the sewers there proposed without the filing of additional maps, and the assessments therefor will be valid. Roosevelt Hospital v. New York, 84 N. Y. 108, Affirming 18 Hun, 582.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.

MOUND CITY LAND & STOCK COMPANY et al., Repts.,
v.

Dina MILLER et al., Appts.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A constitutional prohibition of the taking of private property for private purposes is not applicable to a statute providing for the drainage of large tracts of land.
2. A corporation organized for the drainage of a large tract of land is not private, but a political subdivision of the state.
3. Requiring citizens to become members of drainage districts, and share

It is no defense to the enforcement of an assessment on the roadway of a turnpike company for the construction of a drain that the same is not being built as ordered by the court establishing it, but that a portion has been abandoned, thus making the outlet insufficient, to the injury of the roadway by backwater, where the statute under which the proceedings were had gives the court establishing the ditch control over its construction, and authorizes a direct application to be made to it to require the performance of the work as ordered. Indianapolis & C. Gravel Road Co. v. State ex rel. Flack, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316.

An order to lay a sewer of 15 and 12 inch pipe, located as shown on a plan on file, is sufficiently complied with to uphold an assessment if the plan shows that a part of the pipe is to be 24-inch, which size is used where called for by the plan. Bowditch v. Superintendent of Streets, 168 Mass. 239, 46 N. E. 1026.

It is no ground for the issuing of a writ of injunction restraining the collection of an assessment on an owner's land for the construction of a drain that the drain was not constructed as laid out and established where the duty of determining that question is by law expressly devolved upon the board of commissioners, whose decision cannot be collaterally attacked solely upon that ground. Muncey v. Joest, 74 Ind. 409.

In an action to enforce the statutory lien of an assessment on land for the construction of a ditch, damages sustained by the owner of such land by reason of the failure to construct and complete the ditch fully as petitioned for are not proper subjects either of counterclaim or set-off. Laverty v. State ex rel. Hill, 109 Ind. 217, 9 N. E. 774.

The drainage commissioners of a district organized under the drainage laws of Illinois have no power to contract with an individual for the removal of his dam across a creek to afford better drainage facilities for the district, or to assess the lands of the district to pay the consideration agreed by them to be paid such individual, where such improvement was not described in the report and accompanying plans and profiles filed by them when the district was organized, and they did not, prior to the making of such contract, file a report recommending such improvement, so as to afford the owners of lands in the district an opportunity to be heard thereon. Badger v. Inlet Drainage Dist. 141 Ill. 540, 31 N. E. 170, Affirming 42 Ill. App. 79.

An assessment for the construction of a sewer system will not be rendered void by the fact that the sewer is not laid under two streets 60 L. R. A.

the expense of drainage, against their wills, does not make the law unconstitutional.

4. The right of trial by jury does not extend to proceedings for the organization of drainage districts.
5. An owner of property who, before it can be included in a drainage district, is given a day in court, is not deprived of his property without due process of law.
6. Basing the voting power in a drainage district on acreage, rather than on membership, is not unlawful.

(November 26, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Holt County in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding for the comprised in the system because they are not graded so as to be ready for a sewer, where the sewers to be laid in them are only laterals, draining these streets alone, so that the whole benefit of the system would accrue to the owners of the property assessed, whether the sewers were constructed in such streets or not. Wewell v. Cincinnati, 45 Ohio St. 407, 15 N. E. 196.

3. Default of contractor.

It is no defense to an action to enforce the collection of an assessment for the construction of a public ditch that the work was not completed, or that it had not been or would not be done according to contract, where the law under which the ditch was established authorizes the drainage commissioner to exercise a reasonable discretion in levying assessments to secure in advance money to pay for work in progress, and gives landowners adequate remedy to compel a performance of the work in accordance with the specifications. Racer v. State use of Rhine, 131 Ind. 893, 31 N. E. 81.

It is no defense to the collection of a drainage assessment that the ditch was being constructed contrary to the plans and specifications, and that the same would not be completed in accordance therewith, where the landowner has a remedy for such divergence by direct proceedings against the commissioners in the circuit court. Stafford v. State use of Rhine, 12 Ind. App. 540, 40 N. E. 701.

Where a contract for the construction of a sewer was forfeited by failure of the contractor to complete the work within the time stipulated therein, the tax bills issued in payment of the work were void, and were not validated by an ordinance extending the time to do the work, made after the forfeiture. Neill v. Gates, 152 Mo. 585, 34 S. W. 460.

Payment of taxes lawfully levied by a meadow company cannot be escaped because of the negligent or improper manner in which the managers of the company have constructed or maintained sluices. Farrell v. Kingessing & T. Meadow Co. 2 Walk. (Pa.) 502.

The misconduct of a commissioner appointed by the court to construct a public ditch in failing to have the work performed in accordance with the plans and specifications does not affect the order of the court establishing the ditch and requiring its construction, so as to defeat the lien of an assessment on lands therefor, since the power of that court still remains to cause the work to be completed in accordance with the spirit and intention of the order made in the first instance. Hackett v. State use of Martindale, 113 Ind. 532, 15 N. E. 799.

incorporation of a drainage district. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

This is proceeding under Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 6517 et seq. (being now Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 8251 et seq.), to have incorporated Squaw Creek drainage district No. 1, in Holt county. The proceeding was instituted in the circuit court of Holt county on July 2, 1899, by the filing of articles of association and a petition for incorporation by a majority of the resident owners of a contiguous body of swamp and overflowed lands, embracing an area in excess of 640 acres, to wit, of about 23,000 acres. The petition conforms to the requirement of the statute in respect to what shall be stated, and is signed by the majority of the resident owners. Proper notice was given, and on the 22d of

The failure to construct a sewer within the time specified in the contract is not excused, so as to entitle the contractor to collect the special tax bills, by the fact that the delay was caused by an injunction, where it was sued out by a third person, and was not based on the illegality of the work. Whittemore v. Sills, 76 Mo. App. 248.

But a contractor is not prevented from collecting the special tax bills for the construction of a sewer by the fact that, by reason of an injunction issued against the work, he failed to complete it within the time specified in the ordinance, where the ordinance referred to the plans and specifications as a part thereof, in which it was provided that the contractor should be entitled to additional time equal to the delay caused by a suspension of the work from any cause. Ibid.

d. Departure from statute.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation establishing a system of drainage and sewers for the entire village is not invalid as providing for a double improvement, although such system involves the construction of sewers in different streets. Walker v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 170 Ill. 410, 48 N. E. 1010.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a main sewer with branches is not invalid as providing for more than one improvement. Payne v. South Springfield, 161 Ill. 285, 44 N. E. 105.

The mere fact that the city council of a municipal corporation ordered a line of pipe sewers to be laid so that the outlet should be at an intermediate point instead of at either end does not convert the line into separate lines so as to render the ordinance providing for the improvement void because creating a double improvement. Church v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 179 Ill. 205, 58 N. E. 554.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer is not void as providing for a double improvement because it provides for the construction of more than one sewer, one having house connection and the others not, and not coming into actual connection with each other, where they are to be made of the same material and in the same way. Hinsdale v. Shannon, 182 Ill. 312, 55 N. E. 327.

A city ordinance providing for the construction of a sewer in a street in connection with the grading and paving thereof, and for a levy of one assessment for the entire improvement, is not void as embracing more than one separate subject.

February, 1900, the defendants filed an answer specifying sixteen principal objections and five subobjections to the incorporation of the drainage district. But of these, nine raised questions of fact, which were found against the defendants by the trial court, and are not open to review here, for the reason that no evidence is preserved by this record, and the bill of exceptions only states that there was evidence pro and con; and also because this court will not review the findings of fact by the trial court where the evidence is conflicting. The other seven objections raise questions of law, and are as follows: "(1) The proposed incorporation or organization is not warranted by the statute, and is in violation of the Constitution of the state of Missouri. (2) That it is an attempt to delegate the police power that should be enforced by the proper officers and rate and distinct improvement, but is only one of several elements which, when united, constitute a single, whole improvement. Murphy v. Peoria, 119 Ill. 509, 9 N. E. 895.

In an action for the obstruction of a ditch, mistakes in the proceedings laying it out, and fatal to the legality thereof, if raised by proper parties, cannot be urged as a defense. Freeman v. Weeks, 48 Mich. 255, 12 N. W. 215.

In an action for damages for obstructing a ditch by which the land of one owner is drained over that of an adjoining owner, the proceeding, under a statute by which the ditch was established, being a final proceeding in a competent court having jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties to the record, cannot be collaterally attacked for irregularity by one who was a party to that proceeding. Chambers v. Kyle, 67 Ind. 208.

V. Necessity must be shown.

a. To make establishment legal.

To authorize the establishment of a drain, it must be necessary to the public welfare. There is no authority, either to take private property for a right of way, or to assess taxes, unless the public good requires it.

See, upon the general subject of necessity, the cases mentioned in subd. I.

Unless proposed drainage is determined to be for the benefit of public health, the proceedings will be void under the New York laws. Burk v. Ayers, 19 Hun, 17.

A finding by trustees that a ditch is necessary is essential to the validity of proceedings for the establishment thereof under the Ohio statutes, and, in the absence of any such finding, the proceedings are void. Rice v. Wellman, 5 Ohio C. C. 834.

Highway commissioners cannot condemn a right of way for a ditch across an owner's premises, under the statute giving that right, unless a necessity exists for such ditch or drain in order to carry off the water from the highway or to drain a pond or slough on the highway; which necessity must, by the terms of the statute, be determined by such highway commissioners. Chaplin v. Wheatland Highway Comrs. 129 Ill. 851, 22 N. E. 484.

To sustain the establishment of a ditch, it must not only be found that it will be conducive to the public health, convenience, and general welfare, but also that it is necessary, under the Ohio statutes in terms calling for both findings, since necessity does not follow the first finding. Caldwell v. Harrison Twp. 2 Ohio C. C. 10.

(3) That the statute under which the petitioners propose to incorporate makes a discrimination between resident owners and nonresident owners of swamp or overflowed lands situate in the state of Missouri, and thereby violates the Constitution of the United States. (4) That the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. (5) That by this class of so-called corporations there is not only an attempt to take objector's property against his will, but a violation of personal right in attempting to make him a member of the corporation against his will." "(10) That the power of assessment and taxation that the so-called corporation or organization sought to be given the organizers or corporations would, if exercised, create an unreasonable burden upon objectors' lands." "(16) Your objectors further say said drainage district should not be organized as asked, and made a corporation for the following reasons: (a) There is no public necessity therefor. (b) The corporation would entail burden on your objectors and others like situated without corresponding benefit. (c) The said drainage district is in fact a private corporation when organized under this plan, and your objectors should not be made members thereof against their wills. (d) The drainage district proposed would be neither a public corporation nor of public utility. These articles, as proposed, are defective in not stating a place or location of its business office. (e) The proposed incorporation or organization attempts to subject the property and lands of your objectors to burden and taxation without providing a right of a jury trial."

A finding by the commissioners as to the necessity of a ditch, and that it is demanded by, or will be conducive to, the public health, convenience, or welfare, as required by statute before establishing a ditch, is essential to the validity of the establishment. Miller v. Graham, 17 Ohio St. 1.

The draining of marshes and ponds for the promotion of the public health has been held as a public object justifying the taking of private property and the assessment of taxes therefor; but the draining of an owner's farm to render it more valuable to him would not be so regarded. Anderson v. Kerns Draining Co. 14 Ind. 199, 77 Am. Dec. 63.

Failure of the court in a drainage proceeding to find affirmatively, either that the proposed drain will improve the public health, or benefit a public highway or street, or be of public utility, as required by the statute under which the proceedings are had, will defeat the right to have the ditch established. Bass v. Elliott, 105 Ind. 517, 5 N. E. 663.

The determination of an inferior tribunal that a town ditch is demanded by, or will conduce to, the public health or welfare, being essential to its jurisdiction, under the Wisconsin statutes, must appear on the face of the proceedings in laying out and establishing a ditch, or such proceedings will be void. State ex rel. Witte v. Curtis, 86 Wis. 140, 56 N. W. 475.

Ditching proceedings, under a statute not requiring the proposed drain to be of public utility, not alleging or proving that fact, are nevertheless invalid and illegal, where, by a later statute in effect at the date of such proceedings and declared to be in addition to other draining laws, power is given to establish drains "when the same shall be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, or where the same will be of public benefit or utility." Delsner v. Simpson, 72 Ind. 435.

A statement in a petition for the establishment of a ditch that its construction would be "conductive to the public health, convenience, and welfare," and would be "of public benefit and utility," is a sufficient "setting forth of the necessity" of the ditch to comply with the statute making that a requirement. Corey v. Swagger, 74 Ind. 211.

Before township trustees can establish a public ditch upon private property under a statute providing for the draining of swamps or marshes which are the sources of disease, they must find that the place to be drained by the ditch is a source of disease, and that the draining of it would promote the public health. Hull v. Baird, 73 Iowa, 528, 35 N. W. 613.

Evidence tending to show that a drain sought to be established would, among other things, carry off water from the vicinity of a public schoolhouse is sufficient to support a finding and judgment of the court that the ditch would improve the public health and be of public utility. Collins v. Rupe, 109 Ind. 340, 10 N. E. 91.

The fact that an owner's land is not noxious to the public health, or that the same will not be promoted by draining his land, does not make a statute authorizing the organization of a company to construct a drain for the public benefit through his land, and to assess the benefits and injuries thereto, void, where the drain must of necessity pass through his land. O'Reilly v. Kankakee Valley Drainage Co. 32 Ind. 169.

Neither the Constitution providing drainage for agricultural and sanitary purposes, nor the drainage laws of Illinois, require that the benefits the lands in a drainage district may receive by reason of such drainage shall be for agricultural or sanitary purposes in the sense that such benefits shall consist alone in improving the capacity to produce agricultural crops or the efficiency of the property for sanitary uses. They require that the districts shall be organized for those purposes; but the only limitation in respect to benefits is that the drains, etc., shall be constructed and maintained by "special assessments upon the property benefited thereby." Coffax Highway Comrs. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 127 Ill. 581, 21 N. E. 208.

A ditch cannot be shown not to be conducive to public health so as to entitle owners of land affected to an injunction restraining the letting of a contract for the construction thereof, unless there is manifest error, not merely technical, in the proceedings of the trustees. Hulse v. Coffland, 7 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 611.

It is not the length of a proposed ditch, but the extent of the drainage to be affected by it, which determines the power to establish it. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

As, under a municipal charter authorizing the construction of a sewer wherever the board of public improvements recommends it as necessary for sanitary or other purposes, a sewer may be constructed for purposes other than sanitary, it is not necessary that the recommendation should state the purpose of the sewer. Eyeraman v. Blakely, 78 Mo. 145.

The turnpike road of a corporation is a public highway within the meaning of a provision in the drainage act authorizing the establishment of drains if the same will be of benefit

The case was tried by the circuit court of Holt county, and the following finding and judgment entered by that court:

"And the court now here being further and fully advised in the premises finds that said petition and articles of association were duly signed and filed in the office of the clerk of this court on the 29th day of June, A. D. 1899, and that a summons was duly issued thereon to each and every and all of the resident defendant landowners who did not waive service of such summons, and that service was duly had on each, every, and all of said defendants not so waiving same, as is fully shown by the return of service by the sheriff of this county herein filed, more than thirty days before the first day of the January term, A. D. 1900, of this court; and that such other resident defendants and landowners interested duly waived the issue and service of such summons, and entered their appearance herein, as will fully appear in their said several written waivers, duly signed, and filed herein; and that all nonresident defendants and landowners not served with summons or waiving the same have been duly and legally notified of the pendency of this proceeding by publication as provided by law. And the court also now being further informed and advised in the premises finds from the evidence adduced that the said petition and articles of association so filed herein were and are duly signed by a majority in interest of the resident owners of the contiguous body of swamp and overflowed lands described in said petition and articles of association, situate, lying, and being wholly in Holt county, Missouri, and that said lands constitute an area exceeding 640 acres in extent, to wit, to one or more public highways. Neff v. Reed, 98 Ind. 841.

The opinion of witnesses as to the public utility of a ditch sought to be established by law is not admissible. Yost v. Conroy, 92 Ind. 464, 47 Am. Rep. 156.

A witness who has stated in detail the number of acres in the vicinity of a ditch, and who has given its size and location, may testify, in an action to establish the ditch, as to how many acres of land would be benefited by its construction; and he may also give his opinion as to what effect the drainage of the wet land would have upon the public health of the community, although he is not an expert. Bennett v. Meehan, 83 Ind. 566, 48 Am. Rep. 78.

b. To uphold assessment.

A constitutional provision that private property cannot be taken for drains and ditches unless the use is public as judicially determined is intended to regulate the right of eminent domain, and has no reference to special assessments for local improvements. Heman v. Schulte, 166 Mo. 409, 66 S. W. 163.

Under an act providing that any drains established under that act shall be necessary and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare, or of public benefit or utility, an assessment on land for the construction of a drain cannot be enforced in the absence of anything in the records of the proceedings to construct the ditch, or any averments in the case, or any evidence, tending to prove that the drain complies with the statutory conditions. Tillman v. Kircher, 64 Ind. 104.

In an action to enforce an assessment against land for the construction of a drain under a statute requiring the same to be necessary and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare, or of public benefit or utility, as a condition of its establishment, it is necessary to establish that the evidence proved, and the board of commissioners found, that such proposed drain would fulfil those requirements. Bate v. Sheets, 64 Ind. 209.

A recovery cannot be had in an action to enforce the lien of an assessment upon lands for the construction of a drain, where the evidence fails to establish that the drain was necessary and conducive to public health, convenience, or welfare, or of public benefit or utility, as required by the statute in force at the time the action was brought, although the proceedings to construct the ditch were begun under a prior act, which did not require the public utility of the drain to be shown before it could be established. Ibid.

An assessment for the cost of constructing a sewer cannot be defeated on the ground that there was no necessity for its construction, a previously constructed sewer extending over substantially the same territory, where such sewer is an extension of a general plan of sewerage existing in the city, and it appears that the original sewer was intended to be only a temporary one, and was not constructed along the lines of the streets, but followed natural drains, and was so situated as to render it difficult to be tapped, and its construction, so far as the city was concerned, seems to have been permissive only. Allen v. Woods, 20 Ky. L. Rep. 59, 45 S. W. 106.

An assessment on lands for the construction of a ditch is void where the same was made pending an appeal from an order of the county commissioners finding the proposed ditch of public utility and establishing the same, and the fact that subsequently the appellate court, upon a trial de novo, rendered a judgment similar to that appealed from, does not reinstate the former judgment so as to render the proceedings had thereunder valid. Meehan v. Wiles, 93 Ind. 52.

A sewer which receives the drainage of sewers from intersecting streets is a trunk sewer, and not a local sewer, within the Ohio statutes declaring a local sewer to be one intended for and used exclusively for the drainage and accommodation of lots abutting thereon, assessments for which are valid without a resolution of the council declaring the necessity of the improvements, under a statute giving the board of public affairs exclusive jurisdiction in case of trunk sewers, and dispensing with any action or concurrence of the council in any of the proceedings. Cincinnati use of Deters v. Standard Wagon Co. 1 Ohio N. P. 387.

Abutting owners cannot object to the construction of a sewer forming part of a general system, on the ground that all the owners on the street have already made sufficient private arrangements for carrying off sewage from their premises, since § 2385 of the Ohio statutes justifies such contention only where the person has already, by steps taken by the municipal corporation, and to the construction of which his land has contributed, been entirely or in part supplied with drainage. Johnson v. Avondale, 1 Ohio C. C. 229.

c. Who to determine necessity.

The question whether a ditch is or is not of public utility being by law expressly committed to the decision of county commissioners, their decision cannot be collaterally attacked by in-about 23,000 acres in all, which is and was sought to be incorporated and formed into such drainage district for the purpose of having such said lands reclaimed and protected from the effects of water by such drainage or otherwise. And the court further finds that, for the purpose of organizing and incorporating such drainage district, the said petitioners, a majority of the resident landowners of such body of swamp and overflowed lands in said county, have signed articles of association in which the name of said district is stated to be 'Squaw Creek Drainage District No. 1,' and that the number of years that the same is to continue is fifty years, and that the limits of the same, and the names and places of residence of the owners of lands in said district owned by those proposing to organize the same and join the said organization of said district, and the names of all owners of lands in said district, and the description of lands owned by each, who are or will be benefited by such organization, but who refuse to join in such organization and incorporation. And the court further finds that by the terms of said articles of association the said owners of real estate so forming the said drainage district for said drainage purpose are willing to and have obligated themselves to pay the tax or taxes that may be assessed to pay the expenses of said organization, and to make the improvements that may be necessary to effect the drainage of said lands so here proposed to be formed into said drainage district, and which said articles of association are as follows:" [Setting them out in full.] "Wherefore, the premises considered, the court doth now here order, adjudge, and decree: That the said drainage district be, junction to restrain the collection of an assessment on lands for the construction of the ditch. Marshall v. Gill, 77 Ind. 402.

A drain which will be conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare, and will be of public benefit and utility, is "necessary." Blissard v. Riley, 83 Ind. 300.

When a municipality authorized by statute to construct such sewers as "are required for the benefit or convenience of the citizens, or the promotion of the public health," decides that a sewer ought to be constructed, and directs it to be built, it presumably determines that it is required for the benefit or convenience and promotion of the health of the public, and need not say so in express terms. State, Van Vorst, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 27 N. J. L. 493.

An ordinance directing the construction of a sewer is conclusive as to its necessity, under a municipal charter directing the construction of sewers whenever the city council may deem it necessary for sanitary or other purposes. Miller v. Anheuser, 2 Mo. App. 168.

County commissioners, in determining the preliminary question as to whether a ditch or drain is necessary or will be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, and whether the line described is the best route, are called to the exercise of political, and not judicial, powers, it being a question of public policy, and not of private right. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

A general drainage act which gives to a board of commissioners full discretion and power to determine the necessity for the drainage of any particular section of the state, the creation and organization of drainage districts, and to provide ways and means for the accomplishment of the purpose, is void as an unconstitutional delegation to executive officers of solely legislative powers. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624; Doane v. Weil, 58 Cal. 334.

In Fuller v. Haff, 4 Ohio C. D. 184, it is said that, whether a ditch will be conducive to public health, etc., is to be submitted (under the Ohio statutes) to the commissioners or trustees; and, while the courts of error will supervise if the records disclose affirmatively that an erroneous construction of the statute has been followed, courts of equity will not, ordinarily at least, set aside their conclusion of fact upon such questions, nor grant the right to tile a ditch where such permission has been refused by township trustees, merely because the court might think that, from the facts disclosed, the privilege or right to tile ought to have been granted.

The statement in a special finding in a ditch proceeding that the ditch would benefit the public health is a statement of ultimate fact, and not a mere conclusion of law, since there is no standard by which it can be determined, as a pure matter of law, that a ditch will promote the public health; and such a finding is sufficient to sustain a judgment establishing the ditch and the assessment of land specially benefited by its construction for the cost thereof. Perkins v. Hayward, 124 Ind. 445, 24 N. E. 1033.

A statute giving an appeal from the decision of drainage commissioners as to all material questions except the necessity of the drainage to promote public health and welfare is not void as depriving one of his property without due process of law. State ex rel. Baltzell v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 8 L. R. A. 394, 43 N. W. 947.

Where a statute gives sewer commissioners, in case they find it necessary to construct a sewer or drain through a part of a street not yet opened, power to apply for the appointment of commissioners to open the street, their decision of the question of the necessity to open the street is conclusive, and cannot be reviewed by the courts. Re Fowler, 53 N. Y. 60.

In Bow v. Smith, 9 Mod. 94, the lord chancellor refused to set aside an assessment for the construction of a new sluice on the ground that the old one was sufficient, holding that that was a matter to be determined by the commissioners, and not by the court.

When the legislature has reposed in the county board power to establish a public drain when necessary for purposes intended and conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare, its findings on those points are conclusive. Dodge County v. Acom, 61 Neb. 376, 85 N. W. 292.

A recommendation by the board of public improvements of the passage by the municipal council of an ordinance authorizing the construction of a sewer is equivalent to a declaration that it is necessary, under a charter authorizing the construction of a sewer whenever such board shall recommend it as necessary. Sheehan v. Martin, 10 Mo. App. 285.

A township trustee having, under a drainage act, general jurisdiction, upon petition, to establish a drainage ditch in his township when in his opinion the same will be conducive to the public health, convenience, and welfare, his findings in these respects are conclusive as against collateral attacks, as well as his determination as to whether the route selected is practical or the most practicable for the drainage of the lands in question, in the absence of gross abuse of discretion. Griffith v. Pence, 9 Kan. App. 253, 59 Pac. 677.

and the same is hereby, formed, created, organized, and incorporated in accordance with said articles of incorporation so signed by the said petitioners and filed herein, as drainage district with the boundaries as hereinbefore set out and described; said district to include all the lands in said boundaries described, except such as have been by said petitioners excepted, and the finding of the court herein, on objections duly filed, not to be benefited by such proposed ditch, drains, dikes, or other improvements sought to be effected, as hereinbefore set out and described, and referred to in the court's findings. That the lands so excepted and excluded shall in no form or manner be assessed with any taxes or benefits for the drainage or improvements to be made hereafter by said organization of the lands included in such drainage district, nor shall the lands so excepted and excluded, or the owners thereof, be entitled to any right or interest in and to the ditches, dikes, drains, or other improvements of, or made by, the petitioners or incorporators of the said drainage district. That the said drainage district shall be created and incorporated in and by the name of 'Squaw Creek Drainage District Number One (1),' under which name it shall and may sue or be sued, plead and be impleaded, in all courts of law or otherwise of this state. That such drainage district and incorporation shall be and continue as such under said name for the period of twenty years, and shall possess and exercise all the rights and powers and authority given and conferred by and under the laws as provided under §§ 6517 to 6530, and both inclusive, of article three (3), in chapter ninety-seven (97), of the Revised Statutes

Whether the public welfare makes a sewer necessary or expedient, where the law has confided that question to the judgment of a city council, is a question with which the courts have nothing to do. Joplin Consol. Min. Co. v. Joplin, 124 Mo. 129, 27 S. W. 406.

The courts have no power to enjoin the completion of a drain on the theory that it is injurious to the public health, such power being placed exclusively in those tribunals established by law for the sole purpose of determining the question of necessity and of eminent domain. Swan Creek Twp. v. Brown (Mich.) 90 N. W. 38.

A finding by a board of supervisors in an order establishing a drainage ditch that "all the requirements of the law have been fully complied with," and that the ditch be declared established, necessarily involves a determination of the necessity for the establishment of the ditch, under Code, § 1041, providing that such a ditch shall be established if determined by the board to be conducive to the public health. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 90 N. W. 510.

The legislature has the power to provide for the trial of drainage cases by the court without a jury. Lipes v. Hand, 104 Ind. 503, 1 N. E. 871, 4 N. E. 160.

The provision in the Indiana drainage act requiring questions of fact to be tried by the court without a jury does not conflict with the constitutional requirements that "in all civil cases the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate." Ross v. Davis, 97 Ind. 79; Indianapolis & C. Gravel Road Co. v. Christian, 93 Ind. 360.

A provision in a ditching law authorizing questions of fact, in proceedings for the establishment of ditches, to be tried by the court without a jury, is not unconstitutional as violating the constitutional provision that in all civil cases the right to trial by jury shall remain inviolate. It is a special statutory proceeding, and not a "civil action" within the meaning of the Constitution, which is limited to civil actions recognized by the common law. Anderson v. Caldwell, 91 Ind. 451, 46 Am. Rep. 613.

A proceeding to establish a ditch is a special one, purely of statutory origin, in which the right of a trial by jury may lawfully be withheld by the legislature, as the constitutional provision of the right of trial by jury is applicable only to that clause of common-law actions wherein the right of trial by jury existed when the Constitution was adopted. Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. Ketting, 122 Ind. 5, 23 N. E. 527.

Rev. Stat. 1899, § 8251, providing for the organization of a drainage district by a majority in interest of the resident owners of swamp or overflowed land after notice to all and the granting of a decree fixing its boundaries, after a hearing as to the propriety and necessity of such a district, is constitutional under the principles permitting irrigation, levee, and sewer laws, and is not rendered unconstitutional by the failure to provide any right of trial by jury, as to the formation of such district, no such right in an instance of this kind having ever been given at common law or by the state Constitution. MOUND CITY LAND & STOCK CO. v. MILLER.

The construction of drains is the exercise of the police power of the state, to the determination as to the conduciveness of which to public health the legislature may provide that an agreement of only eight of the jurors is necessary. Thomas v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 453.

A decision of the state court that a special statutory proceeding to establish a drain is not a civil suit or action is not binding on the Federal court in determining whether the proceeding is a civil suit in law or equity within the meaning of the act relating to the removal of causes. Re Jarnecke Ditch, 69 Fed. 161.

In a proceeding under a petition for a public drain, it is no violation of the constitutional provision against taking property without due process of law to deny a trial by jury. Re Bradley, 108 Iowa, 476, 79 N. W. 280.

A statute providing that the agreement of only eight of the jurors shall be necessary upon the question whether a drainage ditch will be practicable and conducive to public health, convenience, and welfare is not a violation of the constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate, and private property shall be held inviolate but subservient to public welfare, as the power of eminent domain is not conferred by the Constitution, but is inherent in the state, and, the determination of the question of the necessity for its exercise resting with the legislature, it is not required to be submitted to a jury at all unless so declared by the legislature. Emig v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 471.

VI. Acquisition of right of way.

a. Right to acquire.

Drainage being for the public good, and within the prerogative powers of government, the necessary rights of way may be procured by right of eminent domain. See note to Re Tut- of Missouri of 1889, and amendments thereto by the general assembly of Missouri of 1895, and as now embodied in the Revised Statutes of Missouri of 1899. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the said drainage district as now formed, created, and incorporated shall consist of, comprise, and embrace therein only such of the lands scheduled in said articles of association and petition for incorporation as may be contained in the following list and schedule, to wit: "[Here follows the list and schedule of lands contained in the drainage district, among which is the following: '80, 10, 60, 30—W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$. James P. Davis, Napier, Missouri.]" The defendant James P. Davis, after proper steps, appealed to this court.

Hill (N. Y.) 49 L. R. A. 781. The public highways are always available for the purpose. See note on Liability of municipal corporations for drainage, post. — Even property which has been devoted to other public uses may be utilized for the purpose of drainage if the necessity therefor exists.

A release of the right of way for a drain need not be obtained from the abutting owners along an established drain by the proposed use of which they will be benefited, where its dimensions are not changed. Sturm v. Kelly, 120 Mich. 685, 79 N. W. 930.

A city, having determined that a sewer is desirable, is only bound to prove that the taking of the property sought to be condemned is necessary for the construction of the sewer, where by statute sewerage has been declared a public use for which private property may be taken. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

The right of highway commissioners to enter upon the land of another for the purpose of constructing a permanent ditch or drain over the same, and to maintain the same permanently for the purpose of draining a highway, involves a freehold. Dierks v. Addison Twp. Highway Comrs. 142 Ill. 197, 31 N. E. 496.

Since the expression of the legislative will authorizing the taking of property for public purposes is of itself due process; and since the ditch act itself provides for notice to interested parties, and gives such parties a right to appeal in case they are aggrieved,—such act does not authorize the taking of property without due process of law. Cribbs v. Benedict, 64 Ark. 555, 44 S. W. 707.

Highway commissioners have no authority to exercise the power of eminent domain for the purpose of carrying over an adjoining farm the sewage which a municipal corporation may deposit upon the highway by drains or other appliances, under a statute authorizing them to enter upon any adjacent lands for the purpose of opening drains, etc., necessary to drain a highway, especially where the sewage is conducted in an unnatural direction. Dierks v. Addison Twp. Highway Comrs. 142 Ill. 197, 31 N. E. 496.

A right of way of a railroad company is subject to appropriation and use for the construction thereon, parallel to its used roadway, of a county ditch which will not be incompatible or interfere with the exercise by the company of any of its franchises, under a statute giving commissioners power to construct ditches, in general terms without restraint or qualification on account of the nature of the use or owner-

But lands in Ohio appropriated and in use for railroad purposes cannot thereafter be condemned for public ditches or drains, where such use would prevent the construction of a side track or double track, or would interfere with the full enjoyment of the land for railroad purposes. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Seneca County, 57 Fed. 945.

The location of a public ditch in part on the right of way of a railroad company is not unauthorized on the ground that property taken for one public use cannot again be appropriated to another public use, where it does not appear that the location of the ditch in any way interferes with the uses of the railroad company,—especially as the latter is not complaining. Steele v. Empson, 142 Ind. 397, 41 N. E. 822.

A public drain may be established and placed on the right of way of a railroad company if it does not impair or destroy the use of such right of way by the railroad company. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Jackson County, 156 Ind. 280, 58 N. E. 837, 59 N. E. 856.

But in an earlier case it was held that the court has no jurisdiction or power to establish and order the construction of a public ditch longitudinally upon the right of way of a railroad company, especially where its use for that purpose would interfere with its public use for railroad purposes for which it was acquired by condemnation, in the absence, in the drainage law under which the ditch is established, of clear and express terms or necessary implication indicating a legislative intent to subject lands devoted to a public use already in exercise to drainage purposes. *Baltimore & O. & C. Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question presented for adjudication in this case is the constitutionality of the drainage laws of this state. The first drainage law in this state was the act of

is a violation of a constitutional provision for uniformity of operation and the prohibition of special laws where a general law can be made applicable, where there is a general statutory provision that any "person," which includes a public corporation, may acquire private property for specified purposes. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

Drainage districts are authorized by the drainage laws of Illinois to obtain control of natural channels outside the districts, which serve as outlets for such districts, for the purpose of enlarging and deepening the same when necessary to render the drainage system available for the purpose for which the districts are organized, by condemnation under the eminent domain act, by which the same pass under the absolute control of the district authorities, and are as much subject to their control for the purpose for which they were condemned as any ditches within their districts. Union Drainage Dist. v. O'Reilly, 132 Ill. 631, 24 N. E. 426.

A statute providing for the construction, reparation, and perfection of drains, ditches, and levees, does not embrace more than one subject contrary to constitutional provisions. Blake v. People use of Caldwell, 109 Ill. 504.

Where it appears that a person objecting to the construction of a drain through his land obtained title thereto after proceedings for the construction of the drain had been instituted, and for the purpose of raising certain objections which the original owner had lost the right to make, the sale is not a bona fide one. Hackett v. Brown (Mich.) 8 Det. L. N. 559, 87 N. W. 102.

An irrevocable right of drainage across another's land cannot be established where the provisions of a statute specially applicable to the case were not observed, and where a parol license was shown revocable under the statute of frauds. Lawrence v. Springer, 49 N. J. Eq. 289, 24 Atl. 938, Reversing 47 N. J. Eq. 461, 21 Atl. 41.

b. How acquired.

1. By contract.

Of course the right of way may be acquired by contract, and an attempt to procure it in that way is generally a prerequisite to a resort to the machinery of the law of eminent domain.

A license to drainage commissioners to construct a drain through property does not vest any title, or give an irrevocable easement in the land. Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 878, 60 L. R. A.

A railroad company which gives a written consent or license for a drain to cross its tracks, and erects a culvert for that purpose, sufficiently releases the right of way, although it does not execute a formal release. Sturm v. Kelly, 120 Mich. 685, 79 N. W. 930.

But a release of the right of way for one drain cannot operate as a release for another. Ibid.

A written contract entered into between a landowner and a municipal corporation, by which the former, in consideration of the dismissal of condemnation proceedings instituted by the latter to acquire the right of way for a sewer across his land, agreed to allow the municipal corporation to enter upon such premises and construct a drain without making him any further compensation, is a sufficient license for the entry by such municipal corporation and the construction of such drain. Bloomington v. Burke, 12 Ill. App. 814.

The act conferring upon cities power to seize property under the right of eminent domain to construct sewers and drains does not deprive them of the power to acquire private property by contract for that purpose, where such power is not denied by any statute. Leeds v. Richmond, 102 Ind. 372, 1 N. E. 711.

A proceeding to lay out a drain will be quashed where the commissioner has not attempted to obtain, as required by statute, a release of the right of way and damages from the property owners through whose premises the drain is to pass. Whisler v. Lenawee County Drain Commissioner, 40 Mich. 591.

Upon a proceeding by highway commissioners to condemn land for the digging of a ditch across the lands of another in pursuance of statute, it must appear from the record of the official proceedings of such commissioners that the digging of the ditch was necessary in order to carry off the water from the highway, and that they had negotiated with such owner for leave to take a part of his premises for the ditch, and had failed to obtain such consent upon a just compensation having been offered him therefor; and parol evidence that the digging of the ditch was necessary in order to carry off the water from the highway is incompetent. Chaplin v. Wheatland Twp. Highway Comrs. 129 Ill. 651, 22 N. E. 484.

A landowner may enjoin the collection of a special assessment for the construction of a sewer across his land, where he was induced to withdraw valid objections to its confirmation by an agreement entered into by the municipal corporation constructing such sewer to condemn

April 21, 1877 (Acts 1877, p. 285). The plan of that act was that upon petition of the owners of a majority interest of the lands to be drained the county court appointed commissioners, who managed the work. The cost was apportioned between the public at large and the individuals whose land was specially benefited, and special assessments were levied accordingly. Then, in 1879, an act was passed (Acts 1879, p. 132), which is the origin and basis of the present law, but it was expressly provided that it should not be construed to alter, amend, or repeal the act of 1877, above referred to. This act contained twenty sections. The scheme of the act was to authorize the formation of drainage districts, to consist of not less than 640 acres each, by the people of the district, and to authorize the people of such districts to manage the business. It permitted the organization of such a drainage district by the majority in interest of the resident owners of swamp and overflowed lands signing articles of association, submitting them to the circuit court, with a petition praying for a decree creating such district. It also provided for notice to all persons in the proposed district who did not join in the petition, and for a trial by the circuit court of the propriety and necessity of such a district, and for fixing the boundaries of the district, and for excluding all the land in the district that would not be benefited by such drainage. It provided for the election, by the people, of a board of supervisors to manage the business; the procurement, by condemnation, if necessary, of a right of way for ditches, drains, and dikes, for levying an assessment, not exceeding 50 cents per acre per year, for the right of way over his land for a street, which it did, but, after the confirmation of the special assessment, vacated the condemnation judgment and dismissed the proceedings, by repealing the ordinance for laying out the street along such right of way. This conduct would warrant the inference that, having acquired possession, the city had no intention of laying out a street, but had a fraudulent design to disregard the agreement, by which such landowner lost a substantial right. Dempster v. Chicago, 175 Ill. 278, 51 N. E. 710.

A contract by which drainage commissioners are permitted to use the banks of a river, and to deepen and widen the stream, and to cut a ditch through the owner's land, paying him the compensation, is one for an interest in land within the statute of frauds. Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. 131.

The owner of land which is so situated as conveniently to receive surface water and sewage collected by a city and discharged from the sewer does not dedicate the land to such purpose by the payment of an assessment for the construction of the sewer,—especially where he has repeatedly protested against the discharge of the sewage upon his premises. Van Rensselaer v. Albany, 15 Abb. N. C. 487.

One whose land is not crossed by a drain, but whose premises are in the assessment district, cannot attack the proceedings on the ground that the releases of all the right of way have not been given, where the commissioner procured releases from the supposed owners, and the rights of the parties in interest had been determined in a suit for an injunction, from which no appeal has been taken. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233.

An oral promise by a property owner to sign a written consent to the construction of a ditch across his land provided the signature of an adjacent owner is obtained does not amount to a license, where, after the latter's signature is obtained, the party giving the promise refused to consent to the construction of the ditch. Hitchens v. Shaller, 32 Mich. 496.

A petitioner for the construction of a ditch, who released the right of way and all claim for damages, and entered into a contract to dig the ditch across his own lands, and agreed that the contract might be relet upon his failure to perform, waives all right to recover damages from parties who thereafter, in good faith, attempt to construct the ditch, if, at the time of the execution of the release, he knew, or by reasonable diligence could have known, of existing defects in the proceedings; but, if he only learned of them in the exercise of reasonable diligence after contracting to construct the ditch, he may recover damages. Hopkins v. Briggs, 41 Mich. 175, 2 N. W. 199.

A common council authorized to construct sewers, purchase land therefor, establish the assessment district, and to fix finally the amount and apportionment of the assessment, may agree with a property owner who deeds the right of way, to exempt his land from assessment for the construction of the sewer, although the original assessment is, under the charter, let by a board of commissioners. In such case the city, having enjoyed the fruits of the contract, is estopped from questioning the power of the council to make it. Colt v. Grand Rapids, 115 Mich. 493, 73 N. W. 811.

A municipal corporation is not liable to a landowner for the amount allotted him as the value of property proposed to be taken for the opening of a street because it constructs a sewer through such premises, where the condemnation proceedings for the opening of the street are subsequently dismissed upon motion of the landowner because of a failure on the part of the municipal corporation to pay the award; and such owner is not entitled to a sum equal to the difference between the award and an assessment of the benefits levied against his land, deposited by the municipal corporation in court. Pearce v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 152, 52 N. E. 27.

An action to compel a village to purchase at a price to be fixed by the court land which it has unlawfully entered upon and appropriated to sewer purposes is of an unprecedented character, and cannot be maintained either at law or in equity. Mitchell v. White Plains, 91 Hun, 189, 36 N. Y. Supp. 204.

The registry laws apply to the permission given by the owner of land to a municipality to construct a drain through his land, whether the agreement conveys the land, creates an easement, or is a mere license which has become irrevocable; so that, if there has been no by-law authorizing the land to be taken, the interest of the municipality therein would be invalid as against a registered deed executed by an assignee of the owner, who was a purchaser for value without notice. Toronto v. Jarvis, 25 Can. S. C. 237.

2. By eminent domain.

In taking land for a sewer, the limit of the public right is the public necessity, and the residue of the use of the land so used remains unaffected in the owner. Wilson v. Scranton, 141 Pa. 621, 21 Atl. 779.

But a title in fee, and not merely an ease-benefits, to pay the expenses of surveys, building drains, ditches, dikes, etc., and the appointment by the county court of a drain commissioner, whose duty it was to survey, locate, mark out, estimate the cost of, and contract for the construction of, all such drains, ditches, dikes, etc. This act passed into the revision of 1889, and became section 6517 et seq. In 1895 the legislature amended three sections of the law, and added a new section, and the law as thus amended passed into the revision of 1899, and became § 8251 et seq., Rev. Stat. 1899, and this proceeding is governed by the law as it was thus enacted and perfected.

Boiled down, the objections to this law may be said to be that it is unconstitutional, because it authorizes the formation of a private corporation for the purpose of improving private property, and forces private individuals to become members of such corporation against their will, and assesses a tax against their property for the improvement of all the property in the district that is benefited by such drainage; that it discriminates between resident and nonresident owners; that it creates an unreasonable burden upon the objectors' lands without any corresponding benefit; and that it subjects the land to burden and taxation without providing a right of trial by jury. Section 20 of article 2 of the Constitution is also said to be violated by this law. That section is as follows: "That no private property can be taken for private use, with or without compensation, unless by consent of the owner, except for private ways of necessity, and except for drains and ditches across the lands of others for agricultural and sanitary purposes, in such manner as may be pre-ment, will be acquired by a town in land taken under a statute giving the right to remove obstructions from a brook and alter its current for sewer purposes, to effect which it may "take or purchase land," and providing that the "title to land so taken shall vest in the municipality." Page v. O'Toole, 144 Mass. 303, 10 N. E. 851.

Where a right of way across private land for the purpose of constructing a sewer was condemned under a statute which had been previously repealed by the adoption of a general statute covering the same subject, the proceedings had thereunder were void, and persons entering on the premises for the purpose of constructing the sewer were trespassers. State v. Tenny, 58 S. C. 215, 36 S. E. 558.

A proceeding to condemn land for a drain under a statute providing for the condemnation of land by a village for a drain is not complete until such resolution or order is recorded, such recording being a condition precedent to the right to enter upon the land and construct the drain. Svensen v. West Salem, 114 Wis. 650, 91 N. W. 121.

c. Compensation must be made.

1. In general.

Permanent appropriation of land for a sewer or gutter cannot be made, even for the public good, without compensating the owner; and, as no general powers to condemn appertain to the duties of corporation officers, an incorporated town which has no authority conferred upon it to condemn land for these purposes may not make an appropriation of private property therefor. Aldrich v. Paine, 106 Iowa, 461, 76 N. W. 312.

Land dry and free from nuisance cannot be permanently appropriated for drains for the benefit of other lands, or even for the general welfare, without compensation. Re Church of Holy Sepulchre, 61 How. Pr. 315.

Land can be taken for a public drainage ditch without the owner's consent only by making just compensation. People ex rel. Williams v. Haines, 49 N. Y. 587.

Authority to drainage commissioners, to enter upon and occupy such lands of private owners as may be needed for the purpose of draining wet and swamp lands, is a taking or appropriation of the lands for public purposes, for which compensation must be made. People ex rel. Cook v. Nearing, 27 N. Y. 306.

The owner of land and a sewer thereon is entitled to compensation if such sewer is appropriated, according to the nature of the appropriation, whether it be so appropriated as to deprive him of all dominion or control over it, or merely by the taking of an easement therein for a special purpose, not depriving him of his rights further than that he shall not use the same for purposes inconsistent with such special purposes. McDonald v. Cincinnati, 4 Ohio N. P. 253.

A landowner is entitled to have his damages for land taken for the construction of a drainage ditch paid within a reasonable time, to be fixed by the court, after the condemnation proceedings, a failure to do which will forfeit the right to appropriate. Skagit County v. McLean, 20 Wash. 92, 54 Pac. 781.

Building a sewer across private property requires compensation under a constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken for public use without compensation, although the market value of the property is not diminished. Smith v. Atlanta, 92 Ga. 119, 17 S. E. 981.

The taking of an easement for a drainage ditch is a taking of private property within the spirit and meaning of a constitutional prohibition. Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333.

The location and construction of a public ditch across or upon the right of way of a railroad company, though the ditch be constructed by tilling under the surface, is an appropriation of the company's property which entitles it to compensation for the value of the interest so taken. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 23, 57 N. E. 1009.

That section of the highway laws of Illinois providing that, when highway commissioners desire to cut a ditch across the land of another for the purpose of draining a highway, the landowner shall be summoned before a justice of the peace "for the purpose of having the damage assessed which such owner may sustain," etc., is broad enough to cover compensation for the land taken, as well as damages to that not taken, and is, therefore, not in conflict with that clause of the Bill of Rights providing that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation. The sense in which the word "damage" is used in the statute is the total loss the owner would suffer by having the ditch on his land. Chaplin v. Wheatland Twp. Highway Comrs. 129 Ill. 651, 22 N. E. 484.

The clause in the highway laws of Illinois authorizing highway commissioners to apply to a justice of the peace to have the damages assessed which an owner will sustain by the cutting of a ditch to drain a highway across his premises, "unless the owner of such land, or scribed by law; and that, whenever an attempt is made to take private property for a use alleged to be public, the question whether the contemplated use be really public shall be a judicial question, and as such judicially determined, without regard to any legislative assertion that the use is public." It is only necessary to say of this last contention that this section does not apply to such a case as this. Heman v. Schulte, 166 Mo. 409, 66 S. W. 163. The levee laws of this state were opposed upon many of the grounds relied upon herein against the drainage laws, but the constitutionality of the former was sustained by this court in Egyptian Levee Co. v. Hardin, 27 Mo. 495, 72 Am. Dec. 276; Columbia Bottom Levee Co. v. Mcier, 39 Mo. 53; Morrison v. Morey, 146 Mo. 543, 48 S. W. 629; and State ex rel. Stotts v. Wall, 153 Mo., loc. cit. 220, 54 S.

W. 465. Irrigation laws have been attacked upon much the same grounds, but their constitutionality has been upheld. Turlock Irrig. Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. 379. Levees keep out the water. Irrigation canals bring in the water. Drains take out the water. The public has an interest in each kind of such laws. By keeping out the water, the health of the inhabitants is conserved, and the value of the lands increased, and the revenues of the state enhanced. Thus, the state is directly interested both for sanitary and financial reasons. The irrigation laws bring in the water, and make valuable the arid lands, and thereby enhance their value, and hence bring in more revenue to the state. Thus the state has a direct pecuniary interest, although not a sanitary interest. The principles underlying the cases upholding the his agent, shall first consent to the cutting of such ditch," means, unless the owner shall first consent after the commissioners have offered him an amount deemed by them to be a just compensation for the damages to be sustained by him. No owner can be compelled to permit a ditch to be cut across his land, unless an offer is made to compensate him therefor. Ibid.

Under a drainage law making provision for compensation to an owner for land taken for ditches and damages to land not taken, which are required to be paid before entry thereon, it would seem that where, by an enlargement of the drainage district, an additional burden of water is precipitated upon his land to its injury, the damages consequent thereto should be assessed and paid by the district prior to the discharge of such additional waters upon his land. Elmore v. Drainage Comrs. 135 Ill. 269, 25 N. E. 1010.

Corporations existing for drainage purposes are public corporations, and land taken for the purpose of a ditch is for a public purpose, and compensation must be made to the owner before his land can be taken for such public use. Payson v. People ex rel. Parsons, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

A town which owns the fee in its streets is entitled to recover compensation as an individual, for injury thereto by the construction of a county drain through them, under Iowa Code 1873, § 1210, which prescribes a procedure for persons claiming compensation for lands taken in the construction of a drain, ditch, or water course. Aldrich v. Palne, 106 Iowa, 461, 78 N. W. 812.

No objection can be made to the laying out of a sewer on the ground that compensation has not been made as required by the Constitution by one who assented to its laying out, and connected his private drain with it. Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208.

Where, at the time of the establishment of the location of a drainage ditch, a property owner made a claim for damages, which was allowed, and in a subsequent action by him to enjoin the completion of the ditch it did not appear that the damage which he would suffer by its completion would be substantially different from that for which he has already been given compensation, such relief will not be granted. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 90 N. W. 510.

The failure of a board of supervisors to have damages to the property through which a drainage ditch was to pass appraised and paid or secured before locating the ditch is not a jurisdictional question, and cannot, therefore, be objected to in a collateral attack. Ibid.

A drainage law which provides for the taking of private property for the right of way of ditches to drain swamps without condemnation proceedings, although providing for the ascertaining and payment of the owner's damages if he comes into court and files his claim, is contrary to the constitutional provision prohibiting the taking of private property without first having made compensation therefor; neither can the law be sustained as a proper exercise of the police power for the abatement of a nuisance, where the act does not require the nuisance to be of such imminent danger to the public welfare as to justify the taking of private property of others than those maintaining the nuisance, without compensation. Askam v. King County, 9 Wash. 1, 36 Pac. 1097.

A ditch law is invalid which does not provide that the compensation for damages for land appropriated for any given ditch shall first be paid in money or secured by deposit, as required by § 19, art. 1, of the Ohio Constitution, but at most only requires its computation in connection with the costs and expenses of constructing the work, to be provided for by assessment, although there is a further provision that the commissioners shall, upon actual view of the premises, fix and allow compensation, and assess such damage as will accrue, but with nothing to show from what source the compensation is to be derived. Smith v. McKee, 3 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 578; Beck v. Medina County, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 108.

A statute authorizing township trustees to locate ditches and drains upon lands adjoining or lying near a public road whenever in their judgment such ditches or drains are necessary for the benefit of the road, but making no provision for compensation to the owner in money to be assessed by a jury for the land appropriated, is invalid under a constitutional provision requiring that, when private property is taken for the purpose of making or repairing roads, a compensation shall be made to the owner in money, and such compensation shall be assessed by a jury. Watson v. Pleasant Twp. 21 Ohio St. 667.

When a ditch proceeding is allowed to continue regardless of whether the owner's compensation should first be "paid in money, or first secured by a deposit of money," and without affording him opportunity to claim or prove compensation and damages, such ditch proceeding is void, and the court will enjoin further proceedings until the ditch is legally established. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

A law is not unreasonable and void which validity and constitutionality of levee and irrigation laws apply with even greater force to drainage laws; for, from a sanitary point of view, the dangers to health arising from overflows occasioned by floods are intermittent, while the dangers to health arising from marshes and stagnant pools of water are continuous, and ever present. There is certainly as much, if not greater, reason and necessity for drainage laws, as there is for levee and irrigation laws. Drainage laws are closely akin to sewer laws. In fact, the only difference between the two is that they are called sewers in cities and closely populated communities, while they are called drains in rural and agricultural communities, and the further difference that sewers are generally covered over to prevent the escape and dissemination of foul odors and noxious gases, and conceal the passage of their contents through the streets, while drains are open. There is, however, no difference in the legal principles applicable to the two. If one is constitutional, so is the other. If private property that is benefited by a sewer can be charged for the benefits it receives against the wishes of the owner, so, also, can the agricultural lands be charged for the benefits conferred upon them. The constitutionality and validity of sewer laws have been uniformly upheld. St. Louis use of Oremer v. Olters, 36 Mo. 456; Kansas City v. Kidenour, 84 Mo. 253; St. Joseph use of Gibson v. Owen, 110 Mo. 445, 19 S. W. 713; Heman v. Allen, 156 Mo. 534, 57 S. W. 559; Heman v. Schulte, 166 Mo. 409, 66 S. W. 163. So, likewise, the validity and constitutionality of reclamation or drainage laws has been upheld by the courts. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U.

falls to provide for the payment of damages from the construction of a drainage canal suffered when no benefits have accrued, when the general law affords a remedy therefor against the corporation. Brown v. Keener, 74 N. C. 714.

A constitutional provision in relation to drainage, which authorizes the passage of laws permitting the owners of land to construct drains across the lands of others, does not authorize the taking of private property for the purpose of drainage without making just compensation, merely because the constitutional provision is silent on the subject of compensation to the owners of the lands over which such drains are to be constructed. Payson v. People ex rel. Parsons, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

The failure of a statute authorizing the construction of a sewer to provide for the payment of compensation for the land taken does not render the statute unconstitutional, where it prescribes that, if the sewer commissioners cannot agree with the owners, they may proceed under the condemnation law of the state, which does not permit lands to be taken except upon payment of compensation. Swikehard v. Michaels, 81 Hun, 825, 29 N. Y. Supp. 777, 80 N. Y. Supp. 1185.

But it has been held that, where the statutes limit the right to apply for damages for the construction of a sewer to six months from the decision to take the land, no application can be made after that time, although the owner of the land injured had no notice of the taking until after the expiration of the six months. Cambridge v. Middlesex County, 6 Allen, 134.

A statute requiring compensation to be made for injuries sustained by the taking of land for sewer purposes does not apply to the temporary draining of a pond while constructing the sewer along a highway. Chelsea Dye House & Laundry Co. v. Com. 164 Mass. 350, 41 N. E. 649.

The owner of land over which it is sought to cut a ditch or drain for public use is entitled, under the Constitution to be paid the value of the ground used for the ditch, and also any damage resulting to the rest of this land by reason of the construction and maintenance thereof. Chaplin v. Wheatland Highway Comrs. 129 Ill. 651, 22 N. E. 484.

The mere fact that the construction of a sewer near private property will be a nuisance at common law does not constitute it a taking for which compensation must be made to the owner, unless required to be made by statute. Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489. 60 L. R. A.

2. When and how made.

Where the statute providing that the allowance by the proper officers of damages to be paid for land taken for a drainage ditch makes the amount payable out of the general fund of the county, there is a sufficient payment or deposit of the money to authorize the continuance of the proceedings under a constitutional provision making that a condition precedent to the taking, where there is nothing to show that the county is insolvent. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

A statute authorizing the condemnation of lands for sewer purposes, which provides that commissioners to make the award shall issue improvement certificates in their own names payable any time they designate within two years, pledging the credit of the cities containing the sewers, is unconstitutional, as failing to secure payment for the private land taken at the time it is appropriated, and as not securing the payment in money. State, Butler, Prosecutor, v. Ravine Road Sewer Comrs. 39 N. J. L. 665.

Wis. Rev. Stat. § 1237, providing a method whereby the owner or occupant of lands entered upon and taken for a drain in the improvement of a highway may, upon application, have his damages appraised and paid by the town, satisfies the provision of Wis. Const. art. 1, § 13, requiring just compensation when land is taken for public use, as the taxable property of such town constitutes a pledge or fund to which such owner may with certainty resort for payment in the prescribed manner. Smeaton v. Martin, 57 Wis. 364, 15 N. W. 403.

Provision for compensation for a right of way for a drainage ditch is sufficient under a constitutional provision that the property cannot be taken until compensation is made, where, in case no funds are on hand arising from the levy of the drainage tax, warrants may be issued by the court which may be negotiated and the proceeds used in paying for a right of way. Redmon v. Chacey, 7 N. D. 231, 73 N. W. 1081.

But a provision for payment of compensation for a right of way for a drainage ditch to be made in county warrants is not sufficient where there is a possibility that there may be no funds out of which to pay the warrants, under a Constitution providing that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner. Martin v. Tyler, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838, 60 N. W. 392.

In drainage assessments, benefits to land in a drainage district cannot be set off against damages for land taken for a ditch. No different

East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist.* 127 Ill. 581, 21 N. E. 206; Riebling v. People use of Columbia Levee & Drainage Dist. 145 Ill. 120, 33 N. E. 1090; Kinyon v. Du-chene, 21 Mich. 498; Sessions v. Crunkilton, 20 Ohio St. 349; Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634. California, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, and New Jersey have reclamation laws, based upon the same principles as our statute. The details of the laws may be different, the agencies employed by the state to carry the laws into effect may differ, but this in no wise affects the constitutionality of the laws. The fact that under some laws the county courts are charged with the duty of carrying the law into effect, while in others commissioners are provided for that purpose, and in others the people themselves are empowered to organize into corporations called "drainage districts," makes no difference. It is competent for the state to raise up a governmental agency for the enforcement of its police powers, and for the purpose of enhancing its revenues and carrying its revenue laws into effect. The agency thus created is an arm of the state, a political subdivision of the state, and exercises prescribed functions of government, and is not a private corporation in any sense. Morrison v. Morey, 146 Mo., loc. cit. 561, 48 S. W. 629 (where the people were authorized to form a corporation); Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634 (where commissioners were to be appointed by a justice of the supreme court); Sessions rule exists with reference to drainage districts than with reference to condemnation proceedings in which private property is to be taken for public purposes. Rayson v. People ex rel. Parsons, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

But in an action to assess the damages to a landowner in a drainage district for the right of way for a ditch, the jury may, by express statutory provisions, offset the benefits against the damages. Taking land in a drainage district for drainage purposes is not a taking of private property for public use within the meaning of a clause in the Constitution requiring just compensation to be made therefor. Winkelmann v. Drainage Dist. 24 Ill. App. 242.

A provision that land required for a drain must be paid for before the work is commenced is for the benefit of the owner, and he may waive it. Olmstead v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 378.

A land owner who fails to avail himself of his statutory right to have his compensation for damages fixed, and makes no opposition to the completion of the canal, thereby forfeits his right to previous compensation, and is not entitled to restrain the use of the canal by an injunction. Jefferson & L. P. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 31 La. Ann. 478.

If the owner of land in a drainage district consents that the amount allowed him for land taken shall be applied to the reduction of his benefits assessed, and pays the excess of benefits over the amount allowed him for compensation, he cannot complain that he was not paid in whole for the land. Elgin, J. & E. R. Co. v. Hohenshell, 193 Ill. 159, 61 N. E. 1102.

When the statute provides that a municipal corporation shall make due compensation for damages necessarily resulting from the exercise of power to construct a drain on private lands, the compensation need not be made, or proceedings instituted therefor, until after it has been so taken. Stonehouse v. Enniskillen Twp. 32 U. C. Q. B. 562.

Under the New York drainage acts of 1869 and 1881, it is not necessary that the damages awarded to the owner of land over which the ditch is constructed should have been actually paid to him prior to the levying of the assessment. Re Swan, 35 Hun, 625.

Compensation for land taken for draining a swamp cannot be made by assessing the amount upon the owners of the land drained according to the number of acres owned by each respectively. Hartwell v. Armstrong, 19 Barb. 166.

An award of the damages sustained by the owner of land for the cutting of a ditch across the same by a municipal corporation, having 60 L. R. A.

been made by arbitrators mutually chosen in pursuance by a resolution of the city council authorizing the submission of the controversy to arbitration, can be enforced against such municipality by an action in assumpsit, in the absence of positive law disabling it from submitting unsettled claims to arbitration. Shawneetown v. Baker, 85 Ill. 568.

d. Procedure.

A statute authorizing the establishing of drains over the lands of others and the assessment thereon of benefits and damages is to be strictly construed in favor of the landowners. Bogart v. Castor, 87 Ind. 244.

Proceedings for taking private property for the construction of a drainage ditch must be in strict compliance with the legislative enactments authorizing them. Nishnabotna Drainage Dist. v. Campbell, 154 Mo. 151, 55 S. W. 276.

In a proceeding to acquire land under right of eminent domain for drainage purposes, the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction must appear in the petition. Re Marsh, 71 N. Y. 315, Reversing 10 Hun, 49.

Proceedings to condemn land for a sewer are not void for failure to file a petition setting forth the inability of the parties to agree as to the compensation to be paid, where the statute leaves the regulation of the proceedings to the municipal ordinance, and the evidence shows their inability to agree, which is all the ordinance requires. Joplin Consol. Min. Co. v. Joplin, 124 Mo. 129, 27 S. W. 406.

In proceedings to condemn a sewer route over a tract of land including platted lots which are a part thereof, it is not necessary to mention them if the description given as to the tract necessarily includes them. Ibid.

In an action by a sanitary district, created under an act of legislature with ample power to condemn such a quantity of land as may reasonably be necessary to carry out the object of the district, to condemn a strip of land over a quarter of a mile wide for the purpose of its main channel, the owner thereof has the right to have the court determine whether or not the taking of so much land is an abuse of the power conferred by seeking to condemn more land than is reasonably necessary for the purpose for which it was created, and for this the court has the power to prevent such abuse. Tedens v. Chicago Sanitary Dist. 149 Ill. 87, 36 N. E. 1033.

In a condemnation proceeding by a sanitary district against the owner of land for the right of way for its main channel, the owner of such

v. Oranblinton, 20 Ohio St. 349 (where county commissioners and township trustees were charged with the carrying into effect the act); Kinyon v. Duchene, 21 Mich. 498 (where drain commissioners, to be appointed by the board of supervisors, were provided for); Colfax Highway Comrs. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 127 Ill. 581, 21 N. E. 206 (where drainage commissioners were provided for); Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663 (where the people of the district were authorized to organize as a district, and to elect a board of trustees to manage the matter); Turlock Irrig. Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. 379 (where the people of the district were authorized to organize as a district, and to elect a board of directors to manage the matter). The legal principles upon which reclamation laws rest are so admirably stated in Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663, that a short extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Field in that case is warranted. He said: "It is not open to doubt that it is in the power of the state to require local improvements to be made which are essential to the health and prosperity of any community within its borders. To this end it may provide for the construction of canals for draining marshy and malarious districts, and of levees to prevent inundations, as well as for the opening of streets in cities and of roads in the country. The system adopted in California to reclaim swamp and overflowed lands by forming districts, where the lands are susceptible of reclamation in one mode, is not essentially different from that of other states where lands of that description is entitled to have plans and specifications of such channel introduced in evidence so as to furnish the court with the necessary data to enable it to determine whether such district is seeking to condemn more of such owner's land than is reasonably necessary to carry out the object of the district. Ibid.

A description of land to be taken for a public drain should be as definite as is necessary in a deed. Mathias v. Carson, 49 Mich. 465, 13 N. W. 818.

Whether or not a description of land taken for a sewer by words and reference to a map is "as certain as is required in a common conveyance of land" as required by statute is a question of fact. Kohlhepp v. West Roxbury, 120 Mass. 596.

In proceedings for the condemnation of land for sewer purposes, if, after definitely locating the culvert, a notice published by the board of public works under the provisions of Special Laws 1887, p. 835, § 8, proceeded, "also a strip 30 feet in width extending from the south end of said culvert to the north end of said culvert, the center line of which strip shall be the center line of said culvert," the property is sufficiently identified, although the assessment sheet and the notice of confirmation, referring, however, to the notice quoted above, omitted the words, "the center line of such strip shall be the center line of the culvert;" the sufficiency and definiteness of an assessment and award are to be ascertained from an examination of the condemnation proceedings taken as a whole, and the notice, being referred to in the assessment sheet or award, is thereby made a part of the latter instrument as though incorporated in it. Lumbermen's Ins. Co. v. St. Paul, 85 Minn. 234, 88 N. W. 749.

A proceeding to take land for a public drain is void where the application therefor gives a line merely, without indicating the width. Mathias v. Carson, 49 Mich. 465, 13 N. W. 818.

In a proceeding to condemn land for the construction of a ditch, the court should not undertake to divest the title of the owner, but only to subject the land to the use required. Palmer v. Harris County (Tex. Civ. App.) 69 S. W. 220.

The action of a commissioner's court in determining that it is necessary to use land for the purpose of draining a public road concludes the question as to the necessity for the taking as far as its submission to a jury is concerned, in a proceeding by a county to condemn the land. Ibid.

A township owning no land, as a municipality to be injuriously affected by the construction of a public drain, may not maintain a bill to enjoin its completion, in behalf of landowners in the township who do not claim to be injuriously affected. Swan Creek Twp. v. Brown (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 52, 90 N. W. 38.

The owner of land whose right to appeal and whose constitutional right to have his compensation for his lands sought to be appropriated assessed by the jury is, on the face of the records, cut off by the act of the county commissioners in making an award and entering it of record as of a date prior to the actual time of making, so that at the latter date the time for appeal appears on the record already to have expired, is entitled to an injunction against the orders and proceedings of the board on and after the date of such entry, but not against the proceedings had prior to that date. Miller v. Logan County, 3 Ohio C. C. 617.

A bill for injunction cannot be maintained against the construction of a sewer outlet so far as the case involves merely the loss of land taken and injury to the remaining land by the construction of the sewer, where, under the statute, damages for such injuries can be assessed in proceedings to obtain the right of way. Dierks v. Addison Twp. Highway Comrs. 142 Ill. 197, 31 N. E. 496.

Condemnation proceedings for a sewer way are in rem; the money award takes the place of the easement taken, and the real owners of the property are entitled to receive it. Lumbermen's Ins. Co. v. St. Paul, 82 Minn. 497, 85 N. W. 525.

In ditch proceedings it is not upon the question of the appropriation of lands, but upon that of compensation for lands so appropriated, that the owner is entitled, of right, to a hearing in court and the verdict of a jury. Zimmerman v. Canfield, 42 Ohio St. 463.

A provision for a jury on appeal to the probate court, which is allowed from the action of county commissioners in allowing compensation and damages for lands appropriated in the establishment of a ditch, is a sufficient compliance with a statutory requirement as to the assessment by a jury of compensation on the appropriation of private property. Chesbrough v. Putnam & P. Counties, 37 Ohio St. 508.

The power conferred upon a corporation created by an act of the legislature for the drainage of wet lands in a designated district, to decide upon the amount of the damages to be awarded and benefits to be assessed to lands over which the work is projected, cannot be justified as a proper exercise of the right of eminent domain, since such company, being a mere private corporation whose existence has not re-tion are found. The fact that the lands may be situated in more than one county cannot affect the power of the state to delegate authority for the establishment of a reclamation district to the supervisors of the county containing the greater part of the lands. Such authority may be lodged in any board or tribunal which the legislature may designate. In some states the reclamation is made by building levees on the banks of streams which are subject to overflow; in other states by ditches to carry off the surplus water. Levees or embankments are necessary to protect lands on the lower Mississippi against annual inundations. The expense of such works may be charged against parties specially benefited, and be made a lien upon their property. All that is required in such cases is that the charges shall be apportioned in some just and reasonable mode, according to the benefit received. Absolute equality in imposing them may not be reached; only an approximation to it may be attainable. If no direct and invidious discrimination in favor of certain persons to the prejudice of others be made, it is not a valid objection to the mode pursued that, to some extent, inequalities may arise. It may possibly be that in some portions of the country there are overflowed lands of so large an extent that the expense of their reclamation should properly be borne by the state. But this is a matter purely of legislative discretion. Whenever a local improvement is authorized, it is for the legislature to prescribe the way in which the means to meet its cost shall be raised,—whether by general taxation, or by laying the burden upon the district specially benefited by the expenditure. Mobile County v.

ceived the assent of a majority of the voters in that district, and which is interested in the replenishment of its own treasury, is not an impartial agency, such as is required to determine the just compensation required under the Constitution to be made in the exercise of that right. Hessler v. Drainage Comrs. 53 Ill. 105.

The construction of a sewer across a lot held by a husband and wife as tenants by the entirety will be enjoined at the suit of the wife, although the city has taken proceedings to condemn the right of way as against the husband, since the construction of the sewer would prejudice her rights in case she should survive him. Grosser v. Rochester, 60 Hun, 379, 15 N. Y. Supp. 62.

It is a good defense to an action against an adjoining landowner for wrongfully digging a ditch opening into an existing ditch on an owner's land and thereby overflowing his land, that the new ditch was duly established in pursuance of law in a proceeding to which such owner was a party and he had notice of and was assessed for its construction, from which he took no appeal, but stood by and allowed the work to be done on his land without objections; although an action would lie under the statute for failure to enlarge the capacity of the old ditch so as to accommodate the increased flow caused by connecting the new ditch therewith. Powell v. Clelland, 82 Ind. 24.

But one who will be injured by the construction of a proposed ditch is not estopped from complaining of it because the contract for its construction was awarded to him at a public bidding, where he bid for it to keep the work in abeyance until he could have time to file his bill for an injunction. Conrad v. Smith, 32 Mich. 429.

e. Measure of damages.

For the lands appropriated for a drainage ditch the landowner is entitled to full compensation, and is also entitled to the damages to his other lands from which the appropriation is made, but he is not entitled to have awarded him, as part of his compensation, the value of a strip of land not actually appropriated, on each side of the ditch; nor is he entitled to have the cost of constructing such portion of the ditch as the trustees apportion to him to construct, assessed as part of his damages. Miller v. Weber, 1 Ohio C. C. 130.

The measure of damages for land across which a sewer is constructed is the value of the land appropriated, in estimating which the fact that the owner may still apply the premises to 60 L. R. A.

any use not inconsistent with the existence of the sewer may be considered. Atlanta v. Hunicutt, 95 Ga. 138, 22 S. E. 130.

In condemnation for sewer purposes, only the value of land actually taken can be awarded, not damage to the rest of the premises from prior noxious discharge of sewage. Stewart v. Rutland, 58 Vt. 12, 4 Atl. 420.

But so far as by taking a part of one's land for purposes of a sewer a source of harm is brought nearer to the part which is left, the damages caused by the increased proximity may be recovered for, whether apart from the statute the source of harm would have amounted to a nuisance or not. Taft v. Com. 158 Mass. 526, 33 N. E. 1046.

So, the owner of land taken for sewerage works is entitled to compensation for injury to other lands owned by him, not only by the construction of the works, but by their use, even though no nuisance be caused by such use of the works. Essex v. Acton Local Board, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 153, 58 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 594, 61 L. T. N. S. 1, 38 Week. Rep. 209, 56 J. P. 750.

The damages for land condemned for a sewer outlet may include an allowance for what the owner of the remaining land will be inconvenienced in its use. Bennett v. Marion, 106 Iowa, 628, 76 N. Y. 844.

Under a statute requiring compensation to be made for all damages sustained by reason of the taking of land for a public sewer, anticipated future injury to the remaining property by reason of the use of the property taken may be considered. Lincoln v. Com. 164 Mass. 368, 41 N. E. 489.

In assessing the compensation to be awarded a landowner through whose property a right of way is taken for a sewer which will empty into a stream on his land, no compensation is to be made for the possibility of the deposits from the sewer being made in such a manner as to become a public nuisance, since it must be assumed that the sewer will be used in such a way as to secure a proper and safe disposal of its contents. Clark v. Washington, 1 Pa. Dist. R. 651.

In determining the damages to adjoining landowners by the construction of a ditch, there is to be considered whatever of actual injury, not remote, purely speculative, is caused to their lands by reason of the construction thereof. Thomas v. County Comrs. 5 Ohio N. P. 449.

The owner of land taken for the construction of a drainage ditch is entitled to the full, fair market value thereof, irrespective of benefits thereto by its construction, and by such market value is meant such an amount as could be ob-

Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 704, 26 L. ed. 238, 242. The rule of equality and uniformity prescribed in cases of taxation for state and county purposes does not require that all property, or all persons in a county or district, shall be taxed for local purposes. Such an application of the rule would often produce the very inequality it was designed to prevent. As we said in Louisiana v. Pilebury, 103 U. S. 278, 295, 26 L. ed. 1090, 1096, there would often be manifest injustice in subjecting the whole property of a city—and the same may be said of the whole property of any district—to taxation for an improvement of a local character. The rule that he who reaps the benefit should bear the burden must in such cases be applied."

The opinion of Foote, C., in Turlock Irrig. Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal., loc. cit. 367, 18 Pac. 379, is so opposite to this case that it tained on an offer of the property for sale, after reasonable time and notice, and not at a forced sale on short notice. Ibid.

Under the provisions of the farm drainage law of Illinois, the jury must, in assessing the damages to a landowner in a drainage district, find the value of the ground used for the ditch, also the damages, if any, to the remaining land not taken, and cannot set off the benefits there-to by the drainage, that being the duty of the commissioners. Union Drainage Dist. v. Volke, 163 Ill. 243, 45 N. E. 415, Affirming 59 Ill. App. 283.

In an action to condemn a right of way for a drainage ditch already constructed over land, additional damages by reason of the construction of another ditch above under a separate and independent proceeding, which pours its waters into such lower ditch, cannot be considered, where the condemnation of the right of way for the other ditch is not sought in that action. Skagit County v. McLean, 20 Wash. 92, 54 Pac. 781.

The compensation for land taken for a sewer route should include the injury which will be done to the tract by the emptying of the sewer into a stream flowing across it, although the ordinance authorizing the sewer does not in terms undertake to acquire that right, and the petition describes only that portion of the owner's property over which the sewer will pass. Joplin Consol. Min. Co. v. Joplin, 124 Mo. 129, 27 S. W. 406.

Where a strip of land is taken for the construction of a sewer, its owner is entitled to compensation for the temporary destruction of a water supply on his remaining land during the process of construction, where the statute requires compensation to be made for all damages that shall be sustained by reason of the taking. Penney v. Com. 178 Mass. 507, 53 N. E. 865.

The damages to be awarded by viewers upon the construction of a public sewer must be the unavoidable result of the act of eminent domain, either temporary or permanent, and as of the date of the completion of the sewer. Re Chatham Street, 16 Pa. Super. Ct. 103.

In a proceeding to condemn land for the construction of a ditch to drain a public road, the market value of the entire tract sought to be condemned must be considered in assessing the damages, although the entire tract so taken may not be necessary for the construction of the ditch. Palmer v. Harris County (Tex. Civ. App.) 69 S. W. 229.

The reasonable cost of any necessary adaptation of remaining land to the new state of 60 L. R. A.

requires partial reproduction here. He said: "One of the distinguished counsel for the defendant contends that the districts contemplated by the act are private corporations formed for a private purpose; to use his own language, 'Such an organization has none of the elements of a public municipal body.' While another able attorney on the same side contends that 'all the constituents of a public corporation are present, and to that class of corporations a district of the statute must be assigned,' and claims that the money sought to be raised under the act is a general tax, and that the system of organization of the corporations prescribed in the act is in conflict with the general plan of constitutional political organizations, and that the mode of taxation provided is different from that made necessary by the Constitution for general governmental purposes, things produced by a sewer for which a portion of the land is taken may be considered by the jury in assessing the damages for such taking and injury to the remaining land. Butcher's Slaughtering & Melting Assn. v. Com. 163 Mass. 386, 40 N. E. 176.

Damages to abutting property from the temporary escape of sewer gas during the time reasonably necessary for making repairs to a sewer or removing obstructions should be considered in determining the compensation to be made in proceedings to condemn land for sewer purposes. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604.

Proceedings for the establishment of a public ditch are not invalid because no allowance of damages was made for running the ditch along the line of an old ditch, as the fact that a new ditch is located on the line of an old one only goes to the question of the costs and benefits of the proposed work, in the absence of any statute making such location unlawful. Denton v. Thompson, 186 Ind. 446, 35 N. E. 264.

When, in the construction of a public ditch across or upon the right of way of a railroad company, it will become necessary to make an excavation under the tracks of a railroad, and for the company to incur expense in supporting the tracks or otherwise while the ditch is being constructed so as not to interfere with the use of its roads at that place, such expense shall be taken into account in assessing the damages of the company. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 23, 57 N. E. 1009, Followed in Northern Ohio R. Co. v. Hancock County, 63 Ohio St. 32, 57 N. E. 1023.

A provision in a drainage law which authorizes the allowance to the owner of land of "such actual damages, only, as will be sustained" by the entry upon his land by another for the purpose of constructing a drain over the same, embraces all damages that will be sustained by, or in consequence of, the entry upon the land and the construction of the drain, the proper construction of the words "actual damages" being all damages, both direct and consequential, which necessarily result from such taking and appropriation, the measure of which will be the diminution in value of the land by reason thereof. Chronie v. Pugh, 136 Ill. 539, 27 N. E. 415.

In assessing the damages to be allotted a lot owner in a drainage district, no damages suffered or sustained in consequence of the original construction of a levee should be allotted, but the same must be confined to such damages as will result from the completion of the proposed work under the present assessment.

and therefore the act is void. We are inclined to agree with the last-mentioned advocate of the defendant's cause, but to the extent only that the districts, when organized as provided in the act under discussion, have all the elements of corporations formed to accomplish a public use and purpose, according to the rules of law laid down in Hagar v. Yolo County, 47 Cal. 223; Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406; People v. Williams, 56 Cal. 647; People v. La Rue, 67 Cal. 526, 8 Pac. 84; Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 86 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945. The results to be derived from a drainage law, and one which has for its purpose the irrigation of immense bodies of arid lands, must necessarily be the same as respects the public good. The one is intended to bring into cultivation and make productive a large acreage of land which would otherwise remain uncultivated, and unproductive of any advantage to the state, being useless, incapable of yielding any revenue of importance toward the support of the general purposes of state government, by reason of too much water flowing over or standing upon or percolating through them. The other has for its main object the utilizing and improvement of vast tracts of arid and unfruitful soil, desertlike in character, much of it, which, if water in sufficient quantity can be conducted upon and applied to it, may be made to produce the same results as flow from the drainage of large bodies of swamp and overflowed lands. Such a general scheme, by which immigration may be stimulated, the taxable property of the state increased, the relative burdens of taxation upon the whole people decreased, and the comfort and advantage of many thriving communities sub-

Lovell v. Sny Island Levee Drainage Dist. 159 Ill. 188, 42 N. E. 600.

After the recovery of damages for injury to the market value of land upon which a public sewer has been constructed, without the legal formalities necessary and proper in such cases of the exercise of eminent domain, no further damages can be recovered when the mere use of the sewer does not constitute a nuisance. District of Columbia v. Hutchinson, 1 App. D. C. 403.

A claim for damages for the overflow of an owner's land resulting from the construction of a dam the erection of which clearly appeared necessary to a feasible and economical prosecution of the work of the drainage district, will be presumed to have been passed upon by the jury in the assessment of such owner's damages in the drainage proceedings, and, if not, the matter becomes res judicata because he might have had such damages determined at that time. McGillis v. Willis, 39 Ill. App. 311.

A right to damages for land taken for a drainage ditch under a contract permitting the occupation for it until the damages are ascertained and the taxes raised to pay therefor, during which time no assessments for benefits shall be collected from the landowner, will pass with a sale of the land. Murray v. Jayne, 8 Barb. 612.

The value of a stone wall by the running foot along the front of the property is a proper element to be considered in an assessment of damages for land taken by eminent domain for sewer purposes. Stone v. Com. 181 Mass. 438, 63 N. E. 1074.

In a condemnation proceeding to ascertain the just compensation to be paid for lands which are subject to overflow, it is not proper to take into consideration the value thereof as affected by their capability of improvement by the erection of dikes, where such dikes, if constructed, would have the effect of wrongfully overflowing the lands of adjoining riparian owners. Burke v. Sanitary Dist. 152 Ill. 125, 38 N. E. 670.

a. Statutory provision must be followed.

Substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute in the form of ordinances for the construction or repair of sewers is necessary to support an assessment for the cost. Kan-60 L. R. A.

lakee v. Potter, 119 Ill. 324, 10 N. E. 212; Combs v. Etter, 49 Ind. 535.

An assessment on lands for the construction of a sewer by a municipal corporation having the power to construct sewers, and to make assessments upon real estate within the corporate limits to pay therefor, will be presumed, in a collateral attack to set the same aside, to be made in accordance with the requirements of the statute, and to be valid and enforceable, unless the complaint discloses a state of facts which clearly shows the assessment to be void. Elkhart v. Wickwire, 121 Ind. 331, 22 N. E. 342.

The county board has no jurisdiction to impose a tax on lands to defray the expense of constructing a ditch unless the statute is complied with in the proceedings relative to the ditch. Curran v. Sibley County, 47 Minn. 313, 50 N. W. 237.

A sewer constructed by a city is unauthorized, and an assessment levied for the cost thereof is void, where the action of the city was based upon neither a petition of a majority of the property holders, nor a recommendation of the board of health, which are the only conditions under which the city is granted the power to construct such sewers. Keese v. Denver, 10 Colo. 112, 15 Pac. 825.

The computation of the cost of constructing a district sewer and the apportionment of the cost between the several lots in the district is void where it is performed by the employees of the engineering department under a municipal charter directing such acts to be performed by the board of public works. Dollar Sav. Bank v. Ridge, 62 Mo. App. 324.

Under statutory authority to open, enlarge, and straighten a drain, commissioners have no power to construct, in addition thereto, a lateral ditch, and the assessment levied by the commissioners is absolutely void where it included the cost of such ditch. Mitchell v. Lane, 62 Hun, 253, 16 N. Y. Supp. 707.

A proceeding to establish a ditch will be quashed where the jurors failed to take an oath to determine the necessity for using the property and the just compensation to be made therefor as required by Mich. Const. art. 18, § 2. Bowler v. Perrin, 47 Mich. 154, 10 N. W. 180.

An injunction will lie to restrain an illegal attempt to collect an assessment on lands for the construction of ditches to drain swamp and low lands which is void because the commissioners failed to go upon and examine all the taxable lands before making the levy, as reserved, would seem to redound to the common advantage of all the people of the state to a greater or less extent. It is true that, incidentally, private persons and private property may be benefited, but the main plan of the legislature, viz., the general welfare of the whole people, inseparably bound up with the interests of those living in sections which are dry and unproductive without irrigation, is plain to be seen pervading the whole of the act in question. This is not a law passed to accomplish exclusive and selfish private gains. It is an extensive and far-reaching plan, by which the general public may be vastly benefited; and the legislature acted with good judgment in enacting it."

The case of Columbia Bottom Levee Co. v. Meier, 39 Mo. 53, is such a complete answer to so many of the contentions made in this case that an extract from the opinion by Fagg, J., in that case is appropriate. He said: "The professed object of the act incorporating the Columbia Bottom Levee Company was to reclaim certain lands adjacent to the Missouri and Mississippi rivers, in the county of St. Louis, from liability to overflow. The designated limits embraced a large amount of land belonging to a number of different proprietors, and in the preamble to the act it is assumed to be passed upon their application. The first board of directors is designated in the act, and the manner of their organization pointed out. Whenever, therefore, it is shown that the said organization did take place as directed, there was a legally constituted company in existence, duly authorized by the act to proceed at once to carry out the purpose of its creation. There can be no question now as to quired by the statute authorizing such drainage. Curry v. Jones, 4 Del. Ch. 559.

The statute to enable owners of marshes swept by the tides to improve them and assess the expense on the land must be strictly followed, or the proceedings will be set aside, as, for instance, two thirds of the owners being required to concur previously; not only must an actual agreement have been made preliminary to action, but it must have been in such indispensible form, and there must be some legal evidence of its existence. State, Ward, Prosecutor, v. Frank & G. Creek Co. 14 N. J. L. 301.

Under statutes providing different proceedings for the construction of trunk and local sewers, which provide that local sewers are such as are intended for use exclusively for the drainage and accommodation of lots abutting thereon, the mere fact that a sewer carries off surface drainage from the streets does not prevent its being local. Cincinnati use of Deters v. Standard Wagon Co. 1 Ohio N. P. 387.

The commissioners of a drainage district have no power to incur the expense of additional work provided for by the provisions of a special contract with the commissioners of another district, without first fulfilling the requirements of the statute as to giving notice to the owners of land in their district, and affording them an opportunity to be heard and to contest the propriety of the work and the expense contemplated. Lima Lake Drainage Dist. v. Hunt Drainage Dist. 101 Ill. App. 72.

Under the statute authorizing sewer commissioners to make and ordain statutes and ordinances after the laws and customs of Romney Marsh in the county of Kent or otherwise, after their own wisdom and discretion, the commissioners are not bound to follow such laws and customs, as the wisdom and discretion to be exercised by the commissioners must be according to law and justice. Keighley's Case, 10 Coke, 139.

b. Jurisdictional facts.

In a proceeding to establish a drain under Neb. Comp. Stat. chap. 89, §§ 7, 8, the jurisdictional facts are, a petition signed by one or more owners of land to be affected by the ditch, the bond provided by statute that the proposed ditch is necessary and will be conducive to the health, convenience, and welfare of the public, and the statutory notice. Darst v. Grifin, 31 Neb. 668, 48 N. W. 819.

The ex parte appointment of a special drain commissioner on the same day the application for his appointment was filed, and without notice to anyone, is invalid. Corey v. Jackson County Probate Judge, 56 Mich. 524, 23 N. W. 205.

In order to sustain special assessments for benefits from a public ditch, the record must affirmatively show a compliance with all the conditions essential to a valid exercise of the taxing power, and the enabling statute will be strictly construed. Casey v. Burt County, 59 Neb. 624, 81 N. W. 851.

Where a municipal charter, after declaring that district sewers shall be established within the limits of the districts to be prescribed by ordinance, expressly confers on the city council power to cause sewers to be constructed in any district whenever it may deem it necessary for sanitary purposes, the character, dimensions, and materials to be prescribed by ordinance or contract, it is not necessary after a sewer district has been established to pass a special ordinance to authorize the construction of each lateral sewer; and an ordinance defining the limits of the sewer district, and authorizing the city engineer to construct such sewers therein as may be necessary, is sufficient, as the contracts made by the city engineer will have to be approved by the council. State ex rel. Cavender v. St. Louis, 56 Mo. 277.

Drainage commissioners cannot, under the New York statutes, levy an assessment for the expenses of a drain until they have acquired a sufficient title to the land required therefor. Olmsted v. Dennis, 77 N. Y. 378.

But a sale of land for taxes for the construction of walls along the banks of a water course flowing through a city and used as a part of its drainage system will not be set aside, and the lien of the assessment discharged, upon a collateral attack in an action to quiet title, on the ground that the assessment was void for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter because the municipality had not, by purchase or condemnation, acquired the right to construct the walls upon private property, in the absence of conclusive proof that the municipality had not acquired such right by dedication, prescription, or otherwise,—especially where the owner stood by and allowed the work to be completed without objecting, and has not paid or tendered the equitable amount of benefits resulting to his land by the improvement. Jackson v. Smith, 120 Ind. 520, 22 N. E. 431.

A municipal corporation has the power, under the statute, to construct a sewer and levy special assessments for the payment of the cost thereof in pursuance of an ordinance previously passed, which provided for its construction in part over private property, without making any the power of the legislature to create such a company, and to invest it with all the necessary power and authority to construct whatever works may be necessary to accomplish the object intended, and to raise the funds to pay for the same by assessments on the lands to be benefited thereby. This question was fully discussed and determined in the case of Egyptian Levee Co. v. Hardin, 27 Mo. 495, 72 Am. Dec. 276. The appellant here (defendant below) insists that he was not a member of the company, and cannot be held liable to its assessments unless he had expressly given his assent to the exercise of such a power by an acceptance of the charter. The power of the legislature to delegate the authority to this company to levy a tax or assessment for the purposes indicated being settled, it follows necessarily that his dissent or assent is a matter of no consequence. The act is evidently passed upon the idea that it is a work of sufficient public utility to require its execution, and to justify the incorporation of a company with the powers granted by it. The power to levy an assessment upon the lands in question is not to be understood as a power to tax in the ordinary meaning of that term. It is the power to compel the payment of a sum limited by the terms of the law as a compensation for a direct benefit conferred. Suppose that the state itself had undertaken to do this work. Will it be pretended that there is no power to compel the owners of the land to pay a tax sufficient to compensate for the actual amount of benefit reprovision for acquiring, by condemnation or otherwise, the right to make the improvement on such property; nor is it essential to the validity of the ordinance that at the time of its passage the right should have been acquired to pass over such private lands. The matter of compensation can be fixed, and the right to use private property acquired, after the adoption of the ordinance providing for the improvement and the levying of the assessment therefor. Hyde Park v. Borden, 94 Ill. 26.

It is not a valid objection to the validity of drain proceedings that the names of two owners of land traversed by the drain were omitted from the application to the probate court, where such owners did not complain, and an adjoining owner has given a release of a sufficient quantity of land to accommodate the entire ditch and the deposits of earth therefrom. Hauser v. Burbank, 117 Mich. 642, 76 N. W. 111.

c. Effect of irregularities.

The legislature may provide that no assessment for a sewer shall be set aside for irregularity unless actual fraud is shown. Re Mayer, 50 N. Y. 504; Re Ellsworth, 53 N. Y. 647.

When a county board has jurisdiction to establish a drain irregularities in the proceedings will not render the assessment void. Darat v. Griffin, 31 Neb. 668, 48 N. W. 819.

Proceedings before drainage commissioners for the establishment of a drain, although in some respects informal, are valid as against a collateral attack. Donalson v. Lawson, 126 Ind. 169, 25 N. E. 903.

A proceeding to lay out a township drain will not be reversed except for very substantial faults. Dunning v. Township Drain Commissioners, 44 Mich. 518, 7 N. W. 239.

A mere irregularity will not invalidate proceedings for the establishment of a public drain, if it does not go to any of the jurisdictional steps. Dodge County v. Acom, 61 Neb. 376, 85 N. W. 292.

Under a statute empowering the common council of a city to lay out, build, and construct sewers in the municipality, and to assess the expenses thereof, it is not necessary, in order to validate the assessments, that the laying out of the sewer be conducted with the technical formalities attached to the laying out of highways. Cone v. Hartford, 28 Conn. 363.

Owners of land which will be benefited by a drainage ditch cannot, after permitting the construction of the ditch without objection, take advantage of irregularities up to and including the letting of the contract for the construction of the ditch, so as to escape liability for payment of the assessments upon their property. Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 477.

When a board has acquired jurisdiction to act for the establishment of a public drain at the expense of benefited property, the presumption is in favor of the correctness and regularity of such proceedings, and should not be overturned except when it is affirmatively made to appear that there is error. Dodge County v. Acom, 61 Neb. 376, 85 N. W. 292.

Under the provisions of the charter of the city of Duluth, the failure of the board of public works to establish a street grade or a sewer system before constructing a sewer, or to give the required notices of the meeting to make an assessment to defray the expenses of its construction and of application for its confirmation by the district court, does not affect the jurisdiction of the district court to render final judgment against the property for the amount of the assessment. Duluth v. Dibblee, 62 Minn. 18, 63 N. W. 1117.

That one of the jurors in a proceeding to lay out a township drain was not a freeholder is not available, where no objection was made at the time, and the party objecting was present at the hearing and declared himself satisfied with the panel. Clark v. Teller, 50 Mich. 618, 16 N. W. 167.

It is no defense to an action to enforce an assessment for the construction of a sewer, that the contractor failed to file a bond as provided in his contract with the city, which the latter had waived, and had accepted the work as having been performed in accordance with the contract. Larned v. Maloney, 19 Ind. App. 199, 49 N. E. 278.

An assessment for the construction of a ditch cannot be collaterally attacked for mere irregularities, where the petition for the establishment of the ditch was sufficient to give the county commissioners jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and remedy by appeal is provided by the statute for irregularity. Foster v. Paxton, 90 Ind. 122.

A statutory provision that, after the adoption of a plan for a sewer system, the council may direct the engineer to make an estimate of the cost, is not violated so as to make the assessment for the construction of the system void, by the fact that the estimate of the engineer as to cost accompanies his plans, and is not called for separately, if the council is thereby put in possession of the necessary information. Wewell v. Cincinnati, 45 Ohio St. 407, 15 N. E. 196.

Equity will not interfere with the collection of a drainage assessment merely for irregularity or defects not affecting the jurisdiction of the tribunal which imposed it. Keigwin v.

ceived by them? If the state can do it, certainly it can delegate the power to a company to do the same thing. Upon the idea, then, that there was a public necessity for this work,—and the legislature must be the judge of that matter,—and that it would result in direct benefit to the lands designated by the act, there can be no hardship upon individuals when the rate of assessment is equal, and the terms are fixed by which they can have a voice in controlling the affairs of the company."

These considerations impel the conclusion that the drainage laws of this state are constitutional and that the corporations organized thereunder to carry them into effect are public, governmental agencies, and in no sense private corporations; that the benefits assessed are legal. The fact that the unwilling citizen is affected by the law, and drawn into the corporation against his will, does not affect the constitutionality of the law. The same is true of every law. Many persons object to many laws, and are drawn within the pale of the law against their will; but this does not affect the constitutionality or validity of the law. So, likewise, laws authorizing the formation of cities, towns, townships, and school districts draw unwilling persons into such association for governmental purposes, and entail taxes and special burdens and individual restraints that were not before imposed. But such results must follow from all laws and all governments. The welfare of the state, the health of the people of the state or of

An injunction will not lie to restrain the collection of an assessment for a sewer on the ground of errors and irregularities occurring subsequent to the adoption of the ordinance and the making of the contract under which the sewer was constructed, where by statute an adequate remedy at law is provided for the determination of such questions by appeal from the assessment. Rickcords v. Hammond, 67 Fed. 350.

An assessment for sewer benefits, which has been duly confirmed, cannot be attacked for matters of procedure in any collateral proceeding. Pollon v. Brunner, 68 N. J. L. 116, 48 Atl. 541.

The advertisement of a plan of sewerage as required by the Ohio statutes is not a jurisdictional fact, and assessments on property on a street omitted from such advertisement are not invalidated thereby, where such street appeared in all subsequent resolutions, ordinances, and advertisements. Cincinnati v. Honnigfort, 32 Ohio L. J. 32.

That the report of viewers of a ditch, proposed to be established under the ditching law does not locate any flood gates, waterways, bridges, or farm crossings, and does not determine whether such gates, etc., are necessary, and that no outlet had been provided for the ditch, whereby adjacent lands would be overflowed and the drain be of no benefit, are defects in the proceedings which do not affect the jurisdiction of the commissioners; and their decision establishing the ditch cannot be collaterally attacked in an action to enjoin the collection of an assessment thereunder. Argo v. Barthand, 80 Ind. 63.

Such defects might have been ground for appeal, but not for injunction.

Questions merely affecting the regularity of the proceedings, and not the jurisdiction of the county commissioners in a proceeding to establish a ditch under a ditching law, cannot be collaterally attacked in a suit to enjoin the collection of an assessment on lands for the construction of the ditch. Cauldwell v. Curry, 93 Ind. 363.

Irregularity before a county board which had jurisdiction of a proceeding to establish a drain cannot be attacked collaterally as a defense to an action to collect the assessment founded thereon. Smith v. Clifford, 99 Ind. 113.

d. Notice; hearing.

1. General rules.

Whether or not notice must be given to persons interested in the construction of a sewer, and a hearing accorded them, depends on the character of the improvement, the statutory provisions on the subject, the light in which the court views the exercise of power by which the improvement is made, and the manner in which the person claiming notice will be affected by the improvement. If the statute makes notice a prerequisite to jurisdiction over the proceeding, it must be given. If the improvement is to be in a public street, where there is a right to place it, and the power to make it resides absolutely in a governmental body, while the cost is to be met by an exercise of the taxing power operating uniformly upon all property affected, there is no reason why any notice should be given except that the assessment roll is in the assessor's hands. If a right of way is to be acquired by right of eminent domain, the property owner must be given notice and an opportunity to be heard. If the assessment is to be according to benefits, or a different rate is to obtain in different parts of the district, the taxpayer is entitled to a hearing. The decisions have not very carefully or fully worked out any rule which may be regarded as uniform.

The attitude of the courts, as it depends on the light in which the proceeding is viewed, is well illustrated by a New York and a Pennsylvania decision. The former holds that the determination of a municipal corporation to construct a sewer is not invalid for lack of prior notice of intention so to do to the owners of property to be affected. Re Zborowski, 68 N. Y. 88.

Under that rule, the improvement may be made by the proper authorities, and the taxpayer can have no voice except indirectly through the ballot box.

The Pennsylvania court held that the legislature cannot authorize a municipal corporation to proceed to construct a sewer without notice to property holders of the proceedings by the viewers, or without a hearing before them or the council, and without appeal or opportunity of contesting the assessment. McKeesport v. Dunshee, 29 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 88.

If the theory which is gradually extending among the courts is correct, that the making of necessary improvements is a governmental function to be exercised when the public good requires it, and that the individual, by becoming a member of the state, agrees to bear his share of the expenses, and cannot defeat projects which are for the public good, it would seem that the New York doctrine is more accurate, and that the consultation of the taxpayer upon the question is a matter of grace rather than of right.

a particular locality of the state, is a matter of governmental concern, and the fact that there are those who are unwilling to become a part of a governmental division of the state, and unwilling to bear the burdens of government, even where they result in personal benefit to them, does not affect the validity of the law.

It only remains to say that the right of trial by jury as guaranteed by the Constitution is in no manner impaired by the laws under consideration. No right of trial by jury existed in such cases at common law, or was ever accorded by any Constitution of this state. Nor is it true that the defendants are deprived of their property without due process of law. Before their property is brought within the benefit district or drainage district, all owners of property are given a day in court. The fact that this case is here is conclusive evidence the defendants are enjoying all the benefits of due process of law, for they are contesting the power of the state to assess their property, even before any work of drainage has been done.

The fact that each owner is entitled to one vote for every acre of land owned by him creates no more infirmity in the law than the right of each stockholder of any corporation to cast as many votes as he owns shares of stock renders such laws invalid. In both instances the majority in interest, instead of the majority in number, controls; and who shall say such laws are not just?

These considerations result in the affirmation of the judgment of the Circuit Court.

All concur, except Valliant, J., absent.

A drainage law is not unconstitutional for the reason that no provision is made for personal service of notice upon the owners of lots affected by the location and construction of a ditch. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

But persons receiving no notice of a proceeding to establish a drainage ditch may attack the proceeding collaterally. McCollum v. Uhl, 128 Ind. 304, 27 N. E. 152, 725.

Drainage proceedings based on some notice are not void. Montgomery v. Wassem, 116 Ind. 343, 15 N. E. 795; Johnson v. State use of Davidson, 116 Ind. 374, 19 N. E. 298; Otis v. DeBoer, 116 Ind. 531, 19 N. E. 317.

The requirements of due process of law in drainage assessment proceedings are satisfied, where a hearing is had upon notice to the property owners before the assessment is made, although some of the preliminary proceedings, which imposed no burden on the property owners, were had without notice. Erickson v. Cass County (N. D.) 92 N. W. 841.

The court, in Paulson v. Portland, 16 Or. 450, 1 L. R. A. 673, 19 Pac. 450, while intimating its opinion to be that failure of a charter to provide for notice to landowners of the proposed construction of sewers comes within the prohibition against taking property without due process of law, nevertheless refuses to declare it void under the rule of stare decisis. But in his concurring opinion Strahan, J., on rehearing, says that the charter expressly provides for notice in cases of street improvements, and that by a section thereof such provisions are made applicable in cases of sewers where the expense is ordered by the council to be made a charge on the property directly benefited; and further, that by ordinance a hearing was provided for, which he deems could be reasonably construed to imply that notice should be given. The court relies upon the case of Strowbridge v. Portland, 8 Or. 67, as deciding the question of the necessity of notice, but in that case notice of the proposed sewer improvement is alleged to have been published declaring the expenses assessed upon the property benefited and describing the property benefited, and the question upon which the contention of the case turned seems to have been more particularly with reference to whether the council should have first declared by ordinance that a sewer was necessary as preliminary to their proceeding to construct the sewer.

ture for the purpose of draining the district thereby created, with power to assess the cost thereof upon the lands benefited, three of its officers being appointed by it for that purpose, whose power to make the assessment is absolute, limited only by their discretion, and without giving the owners of land a hearing or an appeal therefrom; and such officers, not having been either directly elected by the people to be taxed, or appointed in some mode to which they had given their assent, are not corporate authorities, who are the only officers to whom the legislature has the power, under the Constitution, to delegate the right of corporate or local taxation. Gage v. Graham, 57 Ill. 144.

A drainage act is not unconstitutional which furnishes ample facilities for the landowner to present his claim for damages, to contest every question pertaining to his rights, and gives ample opportunities for appeals and questioning the regularity and legality of all proceedings in the establishment of the ditch or drain. Griffith v. Pence, 9 Kan. App. 253, 59 Pac. 677.

The appearance and remonstrance of certain persons whose lands will be affected by a drainage ditch will not affect the right of the court to dismiss the petition in favor of one who, after the proceedings have progressed for some time, enters a special appearance, and moves to dismiss for want of notice, so as to prevent the further progress of the case as against those to whom no notice was given. Sites v. Miller, 120 Ind. 19, 22 N. E. 82.

A motion to set aside judgments in drainage proceedings on the ground of want of notice, and therefore lack of jurisdiction, is a collateral attack, and must show what the record discloses as to notice, appearance, or acquisition of jurisdiction. Long v. Ruch, 148 Ind. 74, 47 N. E. 156.

Statutory requirement.

The will of the legislature is supreme, and, if it directs the giving of notice, notice must be given.

Failure to give the statutory notice to parties interested in a proceeding to establish a drain and open a water course renders all subsequent proceedings void as against parties not waiving notice or otherwise estopped. Wright v. Rowley, 44 Mich. 557, 7 N. W. 235.

A drainage by-law published without a notice of the holding of a court of revision for the purpose of hearing complaints against the assessment at some day, "not earlier than twenty, nor later than thirty, days from the day on which the by-law was first published," as required by

PLATT BROTHERS & COMPANY.

(75 Conn. 387.)

Power to condemn property injured by a sewer system for a temporary period necessary to perfect some other method of disposing of the sewage is not conferred by general authority to construct sewers and acquire by eminent domain the property necessary for that purpose.

(January 7, 1903.)

A PPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven

County denying an application for the appointment of a committee to adjust the compensation to be paid for property temporarily needed for drainage purposes. Affirmed.

Statement by Hamersley, J.:

The substance of the application is as follows: "The respondent and its predecessors in title for many years prior to 1884 and to the present time has owned a tract of land and water privilege on the Naugatuck river, about 2 miles southerly from Waterbury. About 1884 the city, under authority from the legislature, constructed several sewers, by reason of which filthy and noxious substances, accumulated by the inhab-statute is bad, and must be quashed. Re Ferguson, 44 U. C. Q. B. 41.

Notice to landowners affected, of proceedings to establish a ditch under the law, is, both under the Constitution and by the express requirements of the statute upon which the proceedings are founded, essential to the validity of the proceedings. Jackson v. State use of Lindley, 103 Ind. 250, 2 N. E. 742.

A tax deed issued on a sale for drain taxes will be set aside as a cloud on title, where it does not appear that any notice was given of the assessment, or any opportunity afforded to review the proceedings, or that the commissioner examined the lands, or obtained a release of the right of way, or called a jury in the proceeding; and it does not appear that any apportionment of the costs and expenses was made. Pleotter v. Whaley, 80 Mich. 257, 45 N. W. 81.

Under a charter provision requiring the assessors to give notice of the filing of their report and to fix a grievance day, a notice that the assessors had assessed the expense of extending a sewer, had made a report in writing, and had deposited the same with the clerk, and which states the time and place where the parties can be heard, sufficiently complies with the charter. Bell v. Yonkers, 78 Hun, 196, 28 N. Y. Supp. 947.

The right of a drainage district to levy a tax upon property situated therein exists by virtue of the statute alone; and where such statute requires due notice to be given an owner of the organization of the district, a tax levied upon his property is void in the absence of the giving of such notice. Payson v. People ex rel. Parsons, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

Notice to the owners of land along the line of a proposed ditch, of the pendency and prayer of the petition therefor and of the time and place of hearing, required by a statute authorizing the proceedings, is a jurisdictional fact, without compliance with which township trustees have no authority to hear and determine the petition for its construction. Sessions v. Crunkilton, 20 Ohio St. 349.

An injunction will lie to restrain the collection of an assessment on lands for the construction of a public ditch on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction as to the owner because the notice required by the statute to contain the names of all the owners of land affected described his land as being owned by another person, and his name did not appear in the notice or subsequent proceedings, and he had no notice thereof in time to resist the assessment of benefits to his land on the ground that 60 L. no benefits accrued. Vizzard v. Taylor, 97 Ind. 90.

A proceeding to establish a drain is fatally defective where it is not shown that the requisite notice was served upon the persons entitled thereto. Purdy v. Martin, 31 Mich. 455; Daniels v. Smith, 38 Mich. 660; Lane v. Burdnap, 39 Mich. 736.

Proceedings to lay out a drain will be quashed where it does not appear that notice was given to the parties concerned, or that the commissioner endeavored to obtain a conveyance and release of damages from the persons through whose land the drain would be cut, as required by statute. Dickinson v. Van Wormer, 39 Mich. 141.

The court is without jurisdiction to appoint special drain commissioners in the absence of proof by affidavit that the citation issued to those whose lands will be traversed by the drain has been served. Bennett v. Olney, 56 Mich. 634, 23 N. W. 449.

The establishment of a drain by a special commissioner, and the levy of a tax for its construction, are void where no notice of the application for the appointment of the drain commissioner was given to interested parties. Whiteford Twp. v. Phinney, 53 Mich. 130, 18 N. W. 593.

The appointment by the court of a special commissioner in drain proceedings is void where no notice of the petition for such appointment was previously given to the persons interested, and whose property would be taxed for the construction of the ditch. Bettis v. Geddes, 54 Mich. 608, 20 N. W. 608.

A proceeding to lay out a ditch will be quashed where the record does not show that any notice was given of the application for the appointment of commissioners to determine the necessity of constructing the ditch and to assess damages. Lampson v. Ingham County Drain Commissioner, 45 Mich. 150, 7 N. W. 772.

Under an act requiring that notice to sewer a street be addressed to the owners of the premises abutting thereon, such notice must be given to all such property owners, and the failure so to do renders the subsequent proceedings by the local authorities to construct the sewer void, and none of the frontagers are liable for the expenses incurred. Handsworth Urban Council v. Derrington, 66 L. J. Ch. N. S. 691 [1897] 2 Ch. 438, 77 L. T. N. S. 73, 61 J. P. 518.

It is no defense to a proceeding to set aside the location, establishment, and apportionment of a ditch by one to whom no sufficient and proper notice was given, as required by law.

itants of the city, were and still are collected and discharged into the Naugatuck river in such manner that they have been carried down the river and deposited in and about the canals and pond by which the water privilege of the respondent is made available for the manufacturing establishments upon its land, and thereby serious injury to the health of those living upon, or employed about, the premises has been caused, and the respondent has been restricted in the use of its water privilege, especially in the seasons of low water and warm weather, and its rights of property in its land and water privilege have been invaded to its great damage; and thereby the property rights and privileges of the respondent were appropriated and required for the purpose and maintenance and use of said sewers. Said city will be compelled, that he had personal knowledge of the pendency of the petition to establish, that he stood by while the work was being done, and that he was benefited thereby, where it does not appear that any work was done on his own land. Rice v. Wellman, 5 Ohio C. C. 334.

2. To whom.

Where private property is to be taken or injured by the construction of the drain, of course notice must be given, and the compensation fixed with all the certainty which pertains to judicial proceedings.

Under the ditching act which places in the county court the right to exercise eminent domain in the matter of ditches, and provides that the landowner may intervene and show cause why the power should not be exercised, the notice required to be given to the landowner is designed for his protection, and it must be given in the manner prescribed. Cribbs v. Benedict, 64 Ark. 555, 44 S. W. 707.

A proceeding to lay out a township ditch will be quashed if it does not appear that the notice was given to the interested parties of the application for the appointment of drainage commissioners to assess damages, or of their appointment. Reinig v. Munson, 46 Mich. 188, 8 N. W. 723.

The persons entitled to personal service of notice of a proposed improvement of a natural water course and lateral or spur ditches there-to under ditch laws because "affected" thereby are not merely those whose lands are to be assessed, but include those proprietors below the improvement the flooding of whose lands may be increased thereby; and such notice is not dispensed with by personal knowledge of such persons who have not estopped themselves by not objecting; and they are entitled to an injunction restraining the commissioners from proceeding to make the improvement until they have been heard and their rights to compensation ascertained and settled. Neff v. Sullivan, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 785.

Personal notice to the owner of land sought to be taken for the construction of a ditch is not indispensable in order to its condemnation and appropriation, but notice by publication, provided for by a statute regulating such taking, is sufficient, and not a violation of any constitutional rights of the owner; nor is a provision for waiver of the right to compensation in case of failure to make application therefor within a time limited by such act, based upon constructive notice, unconstitutional. Cupp v. Seneca County, 19 Ohio St. 178.

and intends, to collect and discharge into the river said noxious substances in the same manner and with the same effect for the period of five years from the 1st day of June, 1903, before which time the city will change the method of disposing of said sewage, and after that time the property of said respondent will not be needed for the maintenance and use of said sewers. By judgment of the superior court the city has been compelled to pay the respondent the amount of damages thus done to its property prior to April 23, 1901. The city authorities have been unable to agree with the respondent upon the amount of damage so done its property since April 23, 1901, and upon the amount of compensation for appropriating its property till the expiration of the period of five years. Wherefore, by authority of § 4 of an act amending the city act, "to all persons interested" to appear and present their claims for damages for the construction of drainage ditches does not require notice to others whose lands are outside the district being organized, but affects those owners only whose lands are within the district. Santa Fé Drainage Dist. v. Waelts, 41 Ill. App. 575.

To taxpayer.

As indicated above, VII. d. 1, the courts are not fully in accord as to whether or not the taxpayer is entitled to notice.

So far as sewer assessments are concerned, which are made at a uniform rate according to area, the weight of authority is that notice is not necessary.

A sewer is constructed in the exercise of the police power, and that power is exercised solely at the legislative will, so that notice to taxpayers of the intention to construct the sewer and their assent to the proceeding are not necessary. Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750.

A statute authorizing assessments for a sewer, which are to be made according to the number of feet frontage which a lot has on a street, is not unconstitutional because it does not direct any notice to be given of the assessment, and does not give any right of appeal by which errors in the assessment may be corrected. Cleveland v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 50.

Under the Massachusetts statutes, a person benefited by the construction of a sewer may be assessed for his proportionate part of the expense without giving him notice and an opportunity to be heard before the making of the sewer. Allen v. Charlestown, 111 Mass. 123.

An act of legislature authorizing the levy of special assessments on property adjoining or with access to a sewer for the cost thereof at a fixed and uniform rate per foot of frontage and per square foot of area to a certain depth, without notice to the property owners, is not unconstitutional as "without due process of law," since, the amount of the assessment being a mere mathematical calculation with no question of value or matter of judgment involved, an opportunity for a hearing would be useless and futile, especially as such owners could at the proper time contest the constitutionality of the act, and institute proceedings for the correction of injustice, fraud, or error in making the required mathematical calculations. English v. Wilmington, 2 Marv. (Del.) 63, 37 Atl. 158.

A notice of the assessment of a special tax for the construction of a sewer is not necescharter, approved April 14, 1881, and § 7 of an amendment to said charter, approved May 23, 1867, the applicant applies for the appointment of a committee to appraise the damage heretofore done to the respondent's property, and to fix the compensation to be paid for its property taken for the public use, as aforesaid, for the period of five years." The only reason of appeal assigned is the claimed error of the court in sustaining a demurrer to this application on the ground that the proceeding was not authorized by the applicant's charter.

Mr. Henry Stoddard for appellee.

Messrs. John O'Neill and Lucien F. Burpee, with Mr. John P. Kellogg, for appellants:

In the exercise of the right of eminent domain the legislature is the sole judge to sary before issuing the tax bill, where the statute under which it was assessed required the assessment to be based upon the area of each parcel assessed, without including improvements. Heman v. Allen, 156 Mo. 534, 57 S. W. 559, Affirmed in 181 U. S. 402, 45 L. ed. 922, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

The provision of the United States Constitution forbidding the taking of property without due process of law is not violated by reason of failure to notify a taxpayer of the apportionment of a sewerage tax assessed according to area, which would be a mere mathematical calculation, where notice is provided for as to the making and performance of the sewer contract. Gillette v. Denver, 21 Fed. 822.

An assessment for the expense of constructing a sewer is not invalid because of omission to give to the owner of the lots assessed a personal notice that an assessment is to be imposed. Re De Feyster, 80 N. Y. 585.

A statute authorizing a city to provide for the construction of sewers and drains, and to tax the cost upon the lots or ground in the district in which the sewer is situated, is not rendered unconstitutional and void by failure to require notice to the property owners to be charged therewith; but notice must, nevertheless, be given to such owners to sustain the tax, the city having a broad discretion with reference to the kind of notice and the manner in which it may be given. Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 156, 5 Pac. 781.

All that is required in giving notice to property owners to be charged for the cost of sewers and drains is that the notice shall be given before the taxes shall have become such a fixed and permanent charge that the owners can have no adequate remedy to test their validity and fairness. Ibid.

The courts do not all agree to that doctrine, however, as appears from the following cases.

The want of any provision for notice to a lot owner, either actual or constructive, of the proceedings in making assessments for sewers, renders the provisions of that part of the city charter authorizing such assessments unconstitutional and void. Diets v. Neenah, 91 Wis. 422, 64 N. W. 299.

In the absence of statutory provision, reasonable notice is required to be given of the time when a hearing can be had upon a proposed assessment for sewers, and ten days' notice is then sufficient. Auburn v. Paul, 84 Me. 212, 24 Atl. 817.

The failure of the drain commissioner to give notice to the parties interested of the time when an assessment for benefits would be made or be subject to review renders such assessment void as to them, where the assessments were made without their knowledge. Cook v. Covert, 71 Mich. 249, 39 N. W. 47.

In case of farm drainage, where the assessment cannot be by uniform rule, notice and an opportunity to be heard must be given.

The owner of land lying within a drainage district, whose land has been classified according to the benefit it will receive, of which classification the law requires due notice to be served upon such owner, is not entitled to subsequent notices of the making of assessments for the proposed work in accordance with the previous classification; but he is required to take notice of each succeeding step taken by the drainage commissioners to effect the object for which the district has been organized. *People ex rel. An assessment against the land of one who is not named in the ditch proceedings, and who had no notice thereof, is void, and cannot be enforced as a lien. Broemer v. Kelsey, 106 Ind. 504, 7 N. E. 569.

A drainage statute which falls to provide that notice of the assessment must be given to property owners is unconstitutional, although an appeal is authorized and provision made for a hearing. Re Lent, 47 App. Div. 349, 62 N. Y. Supp. 227.

Such proceedings being in personam, personal notice was necessary to charge him, and a trial de novo under the remedial provisions of §§ 4490, 4491, Rev. Stat. would not afford adequate relief; and such statute does not apply to such a case. Miller v. Graham, 17 Ohio St. 1, Distinguished in Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. Bare, 80 Mich. 345, 45 N. W. 345.

Service of notice of a drainage assessment on the person who is described in the petition and named on the tax duplicate as the owner of land will be deemed sufficient in the absence of proof that the real owner had been misled or injured by the failure to serve notice on him, or that he was known to be the owner. Carr v. State use of Cottingham, 103 Ind. 548, 3 N. E. 375.

The actual, though not record, owner of land cannot enjoin the construction of a public ditch through his land on the ground that the proceedings were void because he had no notice thereof, under a statute requiring notice to state the names of owners so far as they can be ascertained from reasonable inquiry and search of the records,—especially where large sums of money have been expended in the construction of a large portion of the ditch, which promises great public and private benefit. Kepler v. Wright, 136 Ind. 77, 35 N. E. 1017.

A proceeding to lay out a township drain is void as to a nonresident landowner affected thereby, who was not named in the proceeding or notified of it, but whose husband was assumed to be the owner of the property. Bixby v. Goss, 54 Mich. 551, 20 N. W. 581.

3. Of what.

Where the charter of a municipal corporation only requires notice of the assessment for a local improvement to be given to the owners of property to be affected thereby, no notice need be given of the action of the common council in defining the area of an assessment for a sewer. Works v. Lockport, 28 Hun, 9.

In the establishment of a drainage district, the matter as to which the property owner is entitled to notice is that his land is included within the body or district of land that is to be subject to general assessment for such improvement; and therefore, where parties had 60 L. R. A.

The limitation as to the time during which it is intended to take and damage the property in the manner described is as proper as any other limitation.

Randolph, Em. Dom. § 233; Wheelock v. Young, 4 Wend. 651; Brook v. Barnet, 57 Vt. 172; Jerome v. Ross, 7 Johns. Ch. 315, 11 Am. Dec. 484.

If the municipality seizes private property for temporary uses, and its occupancy carries with it the right to adapt the property to such uses as its purposes require, the damage must be figured with reference to these and all elements involved; and the time of occupation is as essential in the reckoning as the purpose of the occupation or the use actually made of the property.

notice of the general boundaries of a drainage district to be created, such notice is sufficient. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 90 N. W. 510.

Failure to provide a landowner whose property is not traversed by a drain, but lies within the assessment district, an opportunity to contest the public necessity for the drain, as to which question the determination of the drain commissioner is conclusive by statute, in the absence of condemnation proceedings, does not constitute a taking of his property without due process of law, where the statute provides for notice of the assessment, and gives him an opportunity to be heard thereon. Roberts v. Smith, 115 Mich. 5, 72 N. W. 1091.

A landowner may, in a proceeding for judgment against his land for a delinquent tax, contest the fact of the jurisdiction of the court in including his land within the district when originally organized, where that court had no jurisdiction of the person of such owner by reason of the failure to serve him with the statutory notice of the organization of the district. Payson v. People ex rel. Parsons, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

The owner of land to be affected by the construction of a proposed sewer is not entitled to notice of the passage of an ordinance laying the foundation for the condemnation proceedings to secure the necessary lands therefor. Joplin Consol. Min. Co. v. Joplin, 124 Mo. 129, 27 S. W. 406.

The building of a sewer in a public street is not, ordinarily, such a taking of private property for a public use as requires compensation to be made; it is rather to be considered an improvement or repair to a highway such as the authorities are empowered to make. Hence, the abutting owner, subject to assessment for the expense thereof, is not entitled to notice of intention to construct. Woodhouse v. Burlington, 47 Vt. 300.

A requirement of a statute providing for construction of a sewer, of the publication of notice containing a statement of the size of the sewer, must be complied with to make the assessment of abutting property enforceable. Atlanta v. Gabbett, 93 Ga. 266, 20 S. E. 306

4. Form.

A statute authorizing municipal corporations to construct sewers or drains and assess the cost thereof upon property lying within the district drained by service on the owners thereof of constructive notice by publication is not unconstitutional as without due process of law, since it is within the legislative discretion to deter-

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The essential averments of fact contained in the application may be stated thus: For some years past the city of Waterbury has conveyed, by means of the Naugatuck river, portions of the filth and noxious substances accumulated by its inhabitants to the premises of the defendant, and the putrefaction of the substances thus deposited has damaged the property of the defendant, and seriously endangered the health of those living on the premises and employed about the manufacturing establishments thereon. By a judgment of the superior court the city has been compelled to pay the damages suffered by this defendant by reason of these wrongful acts prior to April 23, 1901. The city intends to continue on the defendant's premises the nuisance described until it has discovered and carried out some feasible plan for otherwise disposing of said substances. It has used due diligence to discover said plan, and will discover and carry out said plan within a period of five years. The city has been unable to agree with the defendant as to the amount of damage resulting from its acts, past and intended. The legislature conferred upon the city by an act amending its charter, approved April 14, 1881, the powers described in § 4 thereof. Said filth and noxious substances were collected and discharged into the Naugatuck river by means of certain sewers constructed by said city under the authority given in said act. Upon these facts the city claims relief through the appointment of a committee which shall fix and determine the damages the defendant has suffered and will mine the kind of notice to be given and the manner of giving it. Swain v. Fulmer, 185 Ind. 8, 84 N. E. 639.

Drainage proceedings, under the law, to establish and construct a public ditch, and to assess the cost thereof upon the land specially benefited, are actions in rem, and belong to that class of cases in which constructive notice only of the filing of the petition is required, and in which notice to nonresidents and unknown owners may be made by publication. Otis v. DeBoer, 116 Ind. 531, 19 N. E. 817.

Notice by publication to the nonresident owners of lands adjacent to a proposed ditch is sufficient, although not addressed to them by their individual names, but only "to the nonresident owners of" certain described lands. Miller v. Graham, 17 Ohio St. 1.

In a proceeding to establish a drain personal service of notice is not necessary, when notice by publication has been given as required by statute. Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. W. 22.

Notice by publication is a sufficient notice to the taxpayer of proceedings for the assessment of a tax on his property for the construction of a sewer. Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750.

Notice of an intention to file a petition for the establishment of a ditch which will affect the lands of others, by posting and without personal notice, as provided by statute, is sufficient. Carr v. State use of Cottingham, 103 Ind. 548, 3 N. E. 375.

Sufficient constructive notice to property owners of proceedings to construct a sewer, the cost of which is to be assessed against their property, and sufficient opportunity to be heard to constitute due process of law, are provided under a charter requiring the publication in the official paper of the city of the fact that a plan for the sewer to be constructed within designated boundaries has been completed and is open for inspection, and offering an opportunity to be heard, also requiring the publication of the action ordering the construction of the sewer, and of the advertisements for bids for doing the work, and giving the council the option to publish notice of the letting of the contract, and that a statement showing the amount of special assessments chargeable to lots benefited is on file with the city clerk, and requiring publication of the resolution for issuing bonds to pay for the work in case the assessments are not paid. Hennessy v. Douglas County, 99 Wis. 129, 74 N. W. 983.

An assessment on township highways for benefits conferred by the construction of a 60 L. R. A.

ditch cannot be enforced where neither the petition for, nor the notice of, the establishment of the ditch mentioned or contained the name of the township or its officers, and the only notice they had of the assessment was the recording in that county of a copy of the assessment, where the drainage law under which the ditch was established requires either the lands affected to be described in the petition, or the names of their owners to be given, and for a like description in the notice, and provides that notice shall be given to such owners. Young v. Wells, 97 Ind. 410.

A general notice by advertisement not giving the names of owners or describing the lands affected by the construction of a sewer, and before it can be known by them what property is benefited thereby, is a reasonable one within the legislative power, and an assessment based thereon is valid. Klein v. Tuhey, 13 Ind. App. 74, 40 N. E. 144.

It is a prerequisite to the validity of an ordinance for building a sewer in Perth Amboy, New Jersey, that the advertised notice to interested parties to appear and be heard should name a time and place for the hearing; and an objection grounded upon failure to give such notice is not waived by appearing at a meeting to hear objections to the assessment and protesting that the sewer is uncalled for, that all the proceedings are unjust and unfair, and that property owners were not consulted. State, Brinley, Prosecutor, v. Perth Amboy, 29 N. J. L. 259.

Defective notice in a ditch proceeding will protect the proceeding from collateral attack. Pickering v. State use of Dyar, 108 Ind. 228, 6 N. E. 611.

Defect of notice is not sufficient ground for collateral attack upon a drainage proceeding if some notice was actually given upon which the court took jurisdiction of the proceedings. Deegan v. State use of Stoddard, 108 Ind. 155, 9 N. E. 148.

A notice served on a property owner, stating that a commissioner appointed to locate a ditch had reported in favor of the location, and that all objections thereto must be filed before a certain date, or that action would be taken and the ditch located without reference to any objections, while not in the exact language used by the statute, is not so defective as to constitute no notice, so that the action of the board of supervisors holding it to be sufficient can be collaterally assailed. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 90 N. W. 510.

One who had actual knowledge of a petition and the proceedings under it for the es-suffer during a period not exceeding five years, by reason of the acts described.

It is certain that the court has no power to grant such relief unless it is conferred by the statute referred to. It is also certain that authority for such an extraordinary proceeding should not be gathered from doubtful inferences, but should be unmistakably expressed. The claim of the applicant is that it is authorized to act as agent of the state in taking private property for public use, and to take any property of the defendant that can be regarded as appropriated by doing the acts it proposes to do, and its claim, therefore, involves the proposition that what it proposes to do is necessary to the sewerage of the city of Waterbury, as contemplated by the legislature in authorizing the construction of sewers which shall discharge their contents into the Naugatuck river. It may well be doubted whether the mere authority to construct sewers emptying into a river flowing through an inhabited country can imply authority to do the acts described. The treatment of that part of a city's sewage which comes from the necessity of surface drainage involves different considerations from those applicable to the treatment of that part of the sewage which comes from the necessity of disposing of accumulation of excreta and substances of a similar dangerous nature. It is matter of common knowledge that accumulations of such substances are a source of danger to health, and even life, and for this reason their speedy removal from a city's limits has been regarded as a public necessity; and the same necessity demands that they shall be so removed, or in some way rendered harmless, that other citizens shall not be exposed to the establishment of a ditch, and who stood by and allowed money to be expended on the faith of the validity of the proceedings without objecting, will be estopped from afterwards moving to dismiss for want of notice, where an attempt was made in the proceedings to comply with the statutory requirements regarding notice, and some, although insufficient, notice was given. Peters v. Griffie, 108 Ind. 121, 8 N. E. 727.

A court of equity has no power to set aside a sale of an owner's property for delinquent drainage assessments upon the ground that the statutory notices required to be given to landowners, antedating the order of the county court confirming the report of commissioners, and finding that a drainage district is duly established, were irregular or insufficient. Calkins v. Spraker, 26 Ill. App. 159.

An ordinance requiring notice of the intended construction of a sewer to be given to the owner of land assessed therefor by personal service, or by leaving the same at his place of residence, is not complied with by leaving the notice on the desk at his place of business during his absence. Mills v. Detroit, 95 Mich. 422, 54 N. W. 897.

Persons who by regular notice and appearance are in court in a drainage proceeding, and upon whose remonstrance the first report of viewers had been dismissed, cannot rely on want of notice of a second report to excuse refileing the remonstrance. West Creek Twp. v. Miller, 142 Ind. 210, 41 N. E. 452.

A drainage proceeding is not subject to collateral attack because the notice was defective if it was sufficient to give the authorities jurisdiction of the proceeding. Jackson v. State use of Dyar, 104 Ind. 516, 3 N. E. 883.

If notice of drainage proceedings was given which the court held were sufficient, the proceedings are not subject to collateral attack because of insufficiency of the notice. McMullen v. State ex rel. Kendle, 105 Ind. 334, 4 N. E. 903.

5. Hearings.

A statute providing for the construction of drains along a roadbed by railroad companies is invalid when it makes no provision for a hearing as to the railroad company at any stage of the proceeding. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Keith (Ohio) 65 N. E. 1020.

The provision of Cal. Pol. Code, § 3493½, for an action by reclamation districts to determine the validity of an assessment, whereby the determination of such question is merely permitted to be made in advance of the action upon the 60 L. R. A.

assessment wherein the owner previously made his showing, and is made conclusive as to the parties, and in which the owner is given the hearing to which he is entitled,—is not unconstitutional. Lower Kings River Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. McCullah, 124 Cal. 175, 56 Pac. 887.

The statute providing for the assessment of damages for the taking of land for a drainage district by a jury, but without an opportunity to the owner to be present at the impaneling of the jury and object to jurors, or to cross-examine witnesses and offer testimony at the original assessment of damages, is unconstitutional, even though it gives him the privilege of objecting to such assessment after it is made. Wabash R. Co. v. Coon Run Drainage & Levee Dist. 194 Ill. 310, 62 N. E. 679.

In Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Evans, 61 Cal. 104, it is held that the failure of statutory provisions relating to the assessment of lands within reclamation districts to provide for any mode by which a party assessed shall have notice of the proceedings and an opportunity to object to the amount charged against his land is immaterial, and does not render the provisions unconstitutional and void, where no assessment against any tract of land can be enforced except by action to which the owner of the tract is a party, in which there is no limitation upon the defenses he may raise, and he is given a full opportunity to contest the charge. See also Reclamation Dist. No. 3 v. Goldman, 65 Cal. 635, 4 Pac. 676; Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945.

A statute authorizing municipal corporations to levy assessments for the construction of sewers is not unconstitutional as failing to provide notice to landowners, and giving them no opportunity to test the validity of the proceedings, where it provides for notice to be given by the town treasurer that the benefits assessed are in his hands for collection, and for the enforcement of the lien created by such assessment in a court of competent jurisdiction, although it limits the owners' defense to proof that the assessment has been paid, and that his lands are not benefited to the amount assessed against them. Klizer v. Winchester, 141 Ind. 694, 40 N. E. 265.

6. Other matters.

A landowner cannot object to the validity of the laying out of a sewer for want of previous notice to him after he has entered his private drain into it. Butler v. Worcester, 112 Mass. 541.

Joining in a remonstrance against drainage to the dangers from which the inhabitants of a city are relieved. Assuming the power of the legislature to authorize a city to maintain nuisances such as are described in the application, even where no controlling necessity exists, it is certainly unlikely that any legislature, in the absence of such necessity, would specifically give to a city such authority; and, where the authority is not clearly given, its inference, from the use of broad phrases or doubtful expressions, would be difficult to justify. In Platt Bros. v. Waterbury, 72 Conn. 531-550, 48 L. R. A. 691, 45 Atl. 154, we intimated the opinion that, if the charter gave the city power to take the respondent's property in this manner, its provisions for instituting proceedings to determine compensation for any property taken should be broadly construed as applicable to all property that might be taken in view of the rule which requires a law to be so construed, if reasonably possible, as to give it validity. But the question of charter authority to thus take property for the purpose of sewerage, as well as the question of authority to institute proceedings for condemnation, was not then material, and we did not pass upon it. In the present case the applicant admits that the acts it intends to do are not necessary for the purpose of sewerage. The application affirms its desire and intention of disposing in other ways of the filth it has cast upon the defendant's premises. The very basis of its application is, not the necessity of taking the defendant's property for the purpose of sewerage, but the necessity of taking the property for the purpose of enabling it to continue the nuisance described until it has provided for its abatement. The public use for which it proceedings will constitute a waiver of notice of such proceedings. Sunier v. Miller, 105 Ind. 393, 4 N. E. 867.

The fact that one or more landowners are not notified of proceedings to establish a ditch does not vitiate to proceedings as to those having notice. Carr v. Boone, 108 Ind. 241, 9 N. E. 110; Poundstone v. Baldwin, 145 Ind. 189, 44 N. E. 191.

The fact that no notice was given to one of the parties against whom an assessment was levied for the construction of a ditch, as required by the law under which it was constructed, does not render the proceedings void as to others properly notified, unless such failure renders them absolutely void. Grimes v. Coe, 102 Ind. 406, 1 N. E. 735.

e. Letting contract.

A municipal corporation may construct public drains or ditches by its officers or servants, and is not bound to let such work out to independent contractors, where the work is not to be done at the expense of adjacent property owners. Platter v. Seymour, 86 Ind. 323.

Public notice of the letting of contracts for the construction of a township drain is required by How. Stat. (Mich.) § 1708. Burnett v. Scully, 56 Mich. 374, 23 N. W. 50.

The fact that the construction of a sewer is a sanitary measure requiring prompt attention does not render a contract for its construction and the tax bill issued thereon valid where the advertising for its letting was done before the ordinance authorizing it went into effect. Keane v. Klausman, 21 Mo. App. 485.

An assessment for sewer construction cannot be maintained so long as it includes an item which was not submitted to competition, where the statute requires it to be done. Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. New York, 144 N. Y. 494, 39 N. E. 386, Affirming 79 Hun, 482, 29 N. Y. Supp. 980.

A clause in an ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer, in conflict with a statutory provision requiring all contracts exceeding $500 for the making of public improvements to be let to the lowest responsible bidder, does not vitiate the balance of the ordinance, but may be rejected as nugatory, leaving the balance of the ordinance in force. Walker v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 170 Ill. 410, 48 N. E. 1010.

A statutory requirement that contracts for sewers or sewer construction shall be let to the lowest bidder applies only to the contract for an original construction, and not to a reletting of the contract in case the original contractor fails to perform his contract. Re Leeds, 53 N. Y. 400.

When an ordinance is passed for the deepening and enlarging of a sewer by enlarging a portion, constructing a portion under a race, and deepening another portion, and after advertisement the contract is awarded for the work, a portion to be under the race and a portion to be open cut, the municipality may change the contract with the same contractor so as to require the whole work to be tunneled without re-advertising. Lutes v. Briggs, 64 N. Y. 404.

That, after the one to whom a contract for a sewer had been let refused to comply with his contract, the contract was let to the next lowest bidder without re-advertising, will not, after the work has been completed, entitle the owners of property assessed to avoid their assessments where the officials have authority to reject any and all bids. Johnson v. Duer, 115 Mo. 866, 21 S. W. 800.

A landowner who stands by with full knowledge and without objections while a contractor expends his money in the construction of a ditch, established under the law in a proceeding in which the court had jurisdiction, cannot, after the completion of the work and the making of the assessment, enjoin the collection thereof on the ground of irregularity in the proceeding, unless he first tender the amount equitably due such contractor for benefits conferred on his land by the work done. Montgomery v. Wasem, 116 Ind. 343, 15 N. E. 795.

Where, by reason of its grades, the drainage of a particular street must be done in sections with different outlets, the fact that one section of the work was begun at the time of the adoption of a city charter will not bring the entire work within the exception of a clause requiring all work to be let by contract excepting work already in progress. Re Blodgett, 91 N. Y. 117.

The requirement of a statute that work upon sewers shall be let by contract, after advertisement, to the lowest bidder is not complied with by fixing the price for rock excavation in the proposal and thereby withdrawing it from competition. Re Manhattan Sav. Inst. 82 N. Y. 142.

A contract for sewer work may reserve the right to increase or diminish the gross length, number, or height of any item without impairing the validity of the contract so as to avoid an assessment in the absence of fraud. Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 596; Re Metropolitan Gas-light Co. 85 N. Y. 526, Reversing 23 Hun, 327.

The mere fact that the advertisements for proposals for sewer work do not involve the claims authority to take property is a condition arising from its delay—reasonable, as is alleged—in providing the appropriate means for exercising the powers given it by the legislature in authorizing the construction of its sewers, and, unlike the public use of sewerage, is a use temporary in its nature. A public use permanent in its nature and indefinite in duration differs from a public use of a temporary nature. The trial court correctly held that authority to take property for a public use of the former kind does not necessarily imply the power to take property for one of the latter kind. When the power to exercise the right of eminent domain is delegated to a private or municipal corporation, the extent of the power is limited by the express terms or clear implications of the statute authorizing its exercise. Currier v. Marietta & C. R. Co. 11 Ohio St. 228; Hibernia Underground R. Co. v. De Camp, 47 N. J. L. 518, 547, 54 Am. Rep. 197, 4 Atl. 318; Bishop v. North Adams Fire Dist. 167 Mass. 369, 45 N. E. 925.

But, if the taking of property is authorized for a public use, either of a permanent or a temporary nature, the appropriation lasts during the continuance of that use. The applicant's charter authorizes it to take land for the public use of highways. It cannot be claimed that such authority to take land implies the right, upon the city's alleging an intention to discontinue the highway laid out, when a feasible plan for laying out other highways has been discovered, and executed, and that it will discover and carry out such plan in five years,—to limit the compensation by a valuation of the property taken for a highway for a period of five years, or to ascertain the whole amount of compensation by a succession of valuations for definite periods. If the legislature can authorize such mode of valuing property taken for public use, whether for the use of highways or use of sewers, it certainly should be clearly expressed. There is nothing in the plaintiff's charter which suggests a legislative sanction for such a mode of proceeding.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

cost of rock excavation, but that the price for this item is fixed, does not avoid the whole assessment, but merely presents a case for the deduction of the objectionable item under the New York act of 1870. Re Merriam, 84 N. Y. 598.

Collusion between city officers and a bidder, by which the latter was made to appear the lowest bidder and thereby obtained a contract for building a sewer, is a good defense to an action to enforce an assessment therefor. Cincinnati v. Steele v. Kemper, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 742.

Where drainage commissioners, after complying with all antecedent requirements with reference to computing costs of improvement, levy or tax, advertising for bids, etc., enter into a written contract for the construction of a ditch, requiring the contractor to enlarge, if ordered by the commissioners so to do, on the basis of payment for the extra work in the same proportion as for the original work, they are not required to advertise again, even though the enlargement involves an expenditure of more than $500, provided they have money on hand or provided for by levy to meet the additional expense. Drainage Comrs. v. Lewis, 101 Ill. App. 150.

Provisions of a statute requiring proposals for sewer construction to be invited by advertisement, and compelling contractors to furnish bond or other security, are to secure proper expenditure of public money, and to protect taxpayers from fraud and imposition in the making of contracts, and are not directory but in the nature of conditions precedent to the building of the sewer, and consequently to the validity of assessments for its cost. Bowditch v. Superintendent of Streets, 168 Mass. 239, 46 N. E. 1026.

1. Remonstrance.

Where by charter a municipality has exclusive power to lay out public sewers, the validity of its procedure cannot be attacked so as to defeat an assessment for an improvement on the ground that all the property owners along the route of the sewer remonstrated against its construction. Park Ecclesiastical Society v. Hartford, 47 Conn. 89.

Landowners cannot, after the time for filing remonstrance has elapsed, withdraw their names from a remonstrance against the establishment of a public ditch so as to defeat the statutory right to a dismissal of the petitioner for its establishment, where two thirds of those affected had remonstrated against such establishment. Sauntman v. Maxwell, 154 Ind. 114, 54 N. E. 397.

Under a statute merely permitting several landowners affected by a drainage improvement to file a remonstrance, the withdrawal of some who have joined in the remonstrance will not defeat it, or impair or affect in any manner the right of others to proceed the same as if such withdrawal had not occurred. Munson v. Blake, 101 Ind. 82.

Under the Jersey City charter and the supplement thereto, the proceedings to construct a sewer can go no further when property owners liable to more than half the assessment therefor file timely remonstrances, although they subsequently withdraw their opposition and erase their names from the protest. State, Jersey City Brewery Co., Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 42 N. J. L. 575; State, Green, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 42 N. J. L. 565.

When the public authorities are required by law to give a hearing to objections of interested parties to a proposed sewer, and they give due notice thereof, the fact that, in addition, they require objections to be submitted in writing does not invalidate the proceedings. State Plard, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 30 N. J. L. 148.

A provision in a drainage law allowing the owners of land affected by a ditch only three days to file remonstrances against the assessors' report is not repugnant to any provision of the state or Federal Constitutions, although the time limit seems unreasonable and oppressive. Hays v. Tippy, 91 Ind. 102.

Appearing and filing remonstrance against a drain will waive all questions pertaining to jurisdiction of the court over the remonstrant. Ford v. Ford, 110 Ind. 89, 10 N. E. 648.

Recognizing drainage proceedings by filing a remonstrance against them on the merits will be a waiver of a defect caused by failure of the commissioners to file their report within the requisite time. Blake v. Quivey, 118 Ind. 124, 14 N. E. 916.

g. Statutory matters.

The levying of an assessment for the construction of a sewer under a drainage law providing for the levying of special assessments according to the mode prescribed by an existing law must follow the mode provided at the time such drainage law was passed, and does not include subsequent additions or modifications of the statute prescribing different modes. Andrews v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 173 Ill. 123, 50 N. E. 335.

Where a statute authorizes the construction of sewers only in public streets, and a sewer is ordered in a private way, but before the construction of the sewer the street is laid out as a public street, an assessment for such sewer is valid. Bishop v. Tripp, 15 R. I. 466, 8 Atl. 692.

Dike and ditch taxes levied subsequent to the adoption of a state Constitution by districts organized prior thereto are illegal and void when the dike and ditch laws are in conflict with provisions of the Constitution, as the effect of the adoption of the Constitution is to abrogate and annul all territorial laws repugnant thereto. Pickering v. Ball, 19 Wash. 185, 52 Pac. 1022.

A municipal corporation cannot divide the levy of a special assessment for the construction of a sewer into instalments, where the statute under which it is constructed provides for the levy and collection of assessments to pay for such work according to the provisions of a general law, which general law did not, at the time such act was passed, provide for dividing special assessments into instalments, although since the passage of that act an amendment has been made to the general law authorizing it. Charleston v. Johnston, 170 Ill. 336, 48 N. E. 985.

A general drainage act will supersede earlier provisions of municipal charters relating to the same subject. State, Vreeland, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 54 N. J. L. 49, 22 Atl. 1052.

When the legislature adopts two drainage acts, the last enactment will, if inconsistent with the earlier one, operate as a repealer by implication; and action taken pursuant to the later statute will not be affected by the repeal thereof, when such action is within a saving clause in the repealer. State, Britton, Prosecutor, v. Blake, 35 N. J. L. 208.

A municipal corporation authorized under its charter to make local improvements by special assessments may construct sewers without creating a drainage district, although another statute under which it might have constructed the sewer requires the creation of drainage districts for that purpose. Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 140 Ill. 216, 29 N. E. 704.

A provision in a drainage law authorizing township trustees to establish public drains for the benefit of highways is so far modified by a subsequent act taking the control of highways entirely out of his charge and giving another official exclusive control thereof as to no longer be enforceable by the township trustee. Jones v. Dunn, 90 Ind. 78.

An act of the legislature empowering county courts to authorize the drainage of land when the same shall be conducive to the public health of its inhabitants, the cost thereof to be paid by local assessments on the lands of those benefited, is not repealed by a subsequent act authorizing the several counties to remove ponds, pools, swamps, marshes, or reclaim swamp land that may cause sickness, to be paid for out of the county levy or by taxation of the taxable property of the county. The second act is intended to apply to cases where the provisions of the first cannot apply, or, at least, not so appropriately. Duke v. O'Bryan, 100 Ky. 710, 39 S. W. 444, 824.

A statute providing for a special drainage system for a certain county, which is covered by a general law providing for a general drainage system to be carried out and executed by town and county officers, is not a violation of the Wisconsin Constitution, providing that the legislature shall establish but one system of town and county government, which shall be uniform and practicable, as the drainage of swamps and marshes is not one of the ordinary functions of town and county officers within the meaning of the Constitution, but is a special authority given for a particular purpose, which may be conferred upon any persons or body upon which the legislature may see fit to confer it. Bryant v. Robbins, 70 Wis. 258, 35 N. W. 545.

The provision of § 2384, of Ohio Rev. Stat., under the subdivision, Sewers, that in no case shall the assessment of sewers exceed $2 per front foot on the property assessed, does not take the levying of assessments for the construction of sewers outside of the general limitation contained in § 2271, providing that in certain municipal corporations no lot or land shall be assessed for any improvement in excess of 25 per cent of the value of such lot or land after the improvement is made, but, taken together, and giving effect to both, they constitute a declaration that such assessments shall in no case exceed 25 per cent of the value of the property, nor amount to more than $2 per front foot on the property abutting on such sewer. Cincinnati v. Connor, 55 Ohio St. 82, 44 N. E. 582.

If the removal of obstacles from rivers will be rendered necessary by the increased flow of water, or is in any way subsidiary to the drainage system or promotive of its proper objects, it is part of the system, although it may incidentally result in the improvement of those rivers for purposes of navigation; and the expression of such removal in the title of the bill creating the sanitary district is not the expression of another subject, but the enumeration of a particular matter in the general subject already expressed, and relieves such title from the charge of duplicity of subjects prohibited by the Constitution. People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217.

The right to construct a single main sewer under general statutory authority to cities and villages to construct drains and sewers is not dependent upon, or affected by, the condition precedent that abutting lots should need local drainage, attached by other separate statutory provisions to the right to construct a general system of sewerage, which do not expressly or by implication take away any of the former powers, but are merely cumulative and intended to give additional powers. Hartwell v. Hamilton County House Bldg. Asso. 7 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 397.

An amendment of the Municipal Code by giving city or village councils the power to determine when it becomes necessary to provide a system of drainage or sewerage for the municipality, and giving authority to proceed in a certain way after such determination to construct such improvements, will restrict power given by existing provisions to "open, construct, keep in repair, and order sewers, drains, and ditches," generally, only in cases where a system of sewerage has been determined to be necessary, and will not prevent the municipality from placing a sewer in a particular street under the old law without providing a system of sewerage and proceeding under the new law. Hartwell v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 40 Ohio St. 155.

Under the New York act for draining lands in Orange county, which authorized the commissioners to construct a ditch of such "depth and size as might be found necessary and useful" for leading off the waters, the commissioners are not limited to their first determination, but, in case that proves insufficient, they are empowered to continue widening and deepening until the object is secured. Houston v. Wheeler, 52 N. Y. 641.

A sewer is within a law relative to assessing upon benefited property the expense of constructing a "new sewer," although there was an old sewer on the street, but on the other side, no part of it being used in the new construction, it being broken down and useless. Hall v. Boston Street Comrs. 177 Mass. 434, 59 N. E. 68.

When a sewer easement across private property has been abandoned for a consideration, it cannot be retaken for such use without the owner's consent, except by proceedings de novo under powers of eminent domain. Strohl v. Ephrata, 178 Pa. 50, 35 Atl. 713.

A township drain commissioner has no jurisdiction to locate a township drain upon the line of a drain laid by the county drain commissioner, unless such first drain has been legally vacated or abandoned. Zabel v. Harshman, 68 Mich. 273, 42 N. W. 44; Tomlin v. Newcomb, 70 Mich. 358, 38 N. W. 815.

A drain commissioner has jurisdiction, under a petition for the location and assessment of a drain, to clean out an old drain or a water course which is part of the new drain to be established, and a separate proceeding is not necessary for that purpose. Strum v. Kelly, 120 Mich. 685, 79 N. W. 930.

County commissioners as conservators of the public health, convenience, and general welfare have power to cause a ditch, lawfully established but in part imperfectly constructed on a line other than the prescribed line, by the owner of the land on which that part was located, and who was ordered by the commissioners to construct that portion, to be reconstructed under a statute authorizing them to exercise jurisdiction and cause an established ditch to be cleaned out, and to cause the ditch to be widened and deepened; and such owner, having neglected to perform in the prescribed manner the work so ordered done by him is in no position to complain of its proper completion by another under the orders of the commissioners, and the charging of the costs upon his land. Crawfis v. McClure, 30 Ohio St. 216.

The power of a municipal corporation to order local drainage is a continuing one, and is not exhausted when exercised once; but the city may, in the proper exercise of its discretion, determine that another local sewer on the opposite end of a lot is necessary, which determination, in the absence of abuse, the court cannot review. Coburn v. Bossert, 13 Ind. App. 359, 40 N. E. 281.

Under authority to extend and enlarge sewers and apportion the expense upon lands benefited, municipal authorities may extend the sewer already completed at the expense of abutting owners, and assess the cost upon the property benefited, including that assessed for the original improvement. Cleveland v. Yonkers, 115 N. Y. 193, 21 N. E. 1058.

Under a statute providing for drainage commissioners, and that the work shall be completed according to their directions, and that, after completion of the business, they shall make return to the court of their doings under the commission, they have no authority to repeat the action if, by the forces of nature, the channels provided by them for the drainage of a pond are filled up so that the pond is again raised to its former level. Smith v. Smith, 148 Mass. 1, 18 N. E. 595.

Equity will not restrain a municipal corporation from locating a drain on private property when there is a safe, adequate, and complete remedy at law, under the statute conferring powers of eminent domain for that purpose, although such location be in the guise of the re-opening of an old drain or water course abandoned for a consideration. Strohl v. Ephrata, 18 Lanc. L. Rev. 1.

Refusal to allow damages for land taken for a sewer exhausts the authority of the municipal authorities, and they cannot subsequently entertain a new petition by the same landowner for the same laying out. Cambridge v. Middlesex, 117 Mass. 79.

No provision having been made in a drainage act for pleading a former adjudication as to a petition for the establishment of a drain, it is to be inferred that the legislature did not intend that one failure to secure the drainage petitioned for should bar all future attempts by the same party. Heick v. Volght, 110 Ind. 279, 11 N. E. 306.

The provision of an act of the legislature, creating a sanitary district, which confers upon the district the power, and imposes upon it the duty, to remove certain locks and dams in waterways, and to deepen and otherwise improve the same beyond the terminus of its own channel, are a necessary part of the general system of drainage for sanitary purposes embraced within the subject expressed in the title, where the result of constructing the proposed system of drainage will necessarily increase the volume of water flowing through such waterways, and, unless the channels of the same are altered so as to accommodate the increased flow, the waterways, as well as the rights of riparian owners along the same, will be prejudiced thereby, and the whole scheme of drainage will fail. People ex rel. Longenecker v. Nelson, 133 Ill. 565, 27 N. E. 217.

The legislative power to drain swamps may be exercised through the intervention of a company created for that purpose. Re New Orleans Draining Co. 11 La. Ann. 838.

If it is found necessary in deepening a ditch in accordance with statutory authority to extend it into another county, in order to execute the authority the ditch may be extended. Yeomans v. Riddle, 84 Iowa, 147, 50 N. W. 886.

A drainage ditch must be so constructed as to prevent its overflow, except in case of extraordinary high water or floods. Bungenstock v. Nishnabotna Drainage Dist. 163 Mo. 198, 64 S. W. 149.

Under authority to improve streams flowing through a town for the purpose of surface drainage, and to divert the water, alter the course, or deepen the channel, a straight channel may be constructed, walled and covered by brick, as in the case of a common sewer. Beals v. James, 173 Mass. 591, 54 N. E. 245.

The power of trustees to grant permission to box or tile a ditch being limited by statute to those who apply in writing at the time of the hearing of the petition, a contract by them with an objecting owner on whose land a ditch is to terminate, permitting the tilling of the ditch by him, and agreeing that he shall not be required to receive more water than can be conveniently carried through a 5-inch tile, is not valid where made, not upon his application, but on a proposal by the trustees to avoid litigation; and does not prevent their successors in office from ordering him to take up the tiling and clean out the ditch to its original capacity as established under the petition; and injunction will not issue restraining them from interfering with that portion of the ditch. Doney v. Truro Twp. 1 Ohio C. C. 566.

An injunction will not lie to restrain a county auditor from selling allotments of ditch work on an owner's land, unless the proceedings under the statute for the establishment of the ditch are void on the face of the record. Young v. Sellers, 106 Ind. 101, 5 N. E. 686.

In an action of trespass against drainage commissioners for the construction of certain ditches upon an owner's land within the drainage district, it must be presumed that the entire damages "consequent upon the construction of the proposed work" resulting to such landowner were considered by the jury in the original condemnation proceedings, and the only question for the jury to determine is whether damages sustained by him by reason of the construction of such ditch in a particular manner were such as were consequent upon its construction, and therefore included within the condemnation proceedings. Doyle v. Baughman, 24 Ill. App. 614.

A municipality having the power to require property owners to connect their premises with sewers, the right to do such connecting may be vested by statute in the municipality itself at the time of the construction of a sewer. Van Wagoner v. Paterson, 67 N. J. L. 455, 51 Atl. 922.

A city has no right to construct house-connection slants to a sewer every 20 feet where the lots are much wider than that, thus casting an additional and unnecessary burden of expense on the property without additional benefit. Gage v. Chicago, 191 Ill. 210, 60 N. E. 896.

But a provision in a sewer ordinance for house-connection slants every 20 feet on each side of the sewer does not vitiate the ordinance, in the absence of any proof that such provision is unreasonable or oppressive. Vandersayde v. People ex rel. Raymond, 195 Ill. 200, 61 N. E. 1050, 62 N. E. 806.

A provision in a sewer ordinance that house-connection slants "shall be placed on both sides of said sewer opposite each 25 feet of lot frontage" does not amount to an arbitrary subdivision of an unsubdivided lot, when the assessment was made upon the entire tract as a whole, according to its legal description. Chicago v. Corcoran, 196 Ill. 146, 63 N. E. 690.

A provision in a sewer ordinance that only one house-connection slant shall be provided for each abutting lot or tract of land, however large, is not a hardship to lot owners, nor unreasonable, where it is also provided that each lot owner shall have the use and benefit of the sewer, and may make additional connection with the sewer. Gage v. Chicago, 195 Ill. 490, 63 N. E. 184.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation providing for the putting in of lateral sewer and water-service pipes for house connections on a street by special tax is not void because such improvement does not constitute a local improvement within the meaning of the law, and is not an abuse of the power of the city council to levy special taxation for the cost of local improvements. Palmer v. Danville, 154 Ill. 156, 38 N. E. 1067.

The cost of house slants to connect with a sewer cannot be incorporated in the cost of the sewer and assessed upon the abutting property, where the property is vacant farm land, and the slants are planned to be 20 feet apart, while the probability is that if the property is ever subdivided into building lots it will never be divided so small as to require slants every 20 feet. Rickerdike v. Chicago, 185 Ill. 280, 58 N. E. 1096.

A provision in an ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer, which grants the use and benefit of an out-fall sewer to all property owners obtaining permission to make connection therewith, does not grant away the police power of such municipality, as such clause does not affect its power to regulate the manner of making such connection, or abate any nuisance thereby created. Gray v. Cicero, 177 Ill. 459, 53 N. E. 91.

That the owner of land included within the area benefited by the construction of a sewer has no present right under any existing statute to construct connecting laterals from such land to the sewer, or to procure the construction of the same, does not invalidate the assessment against him, since it is unlikely that the needful legislation would be withheld. McKee Land & Improv. Co. v. Swikehard, 23 Misc. 21, 51 N. Y. Supp. 399.

An ordinance providing that no connection shall be made with public sewers except on written application to, and permission granted by, the common council does not deplete the board of public works of its power, under the charter, to supervise the construction and repairing of sewers, and forbid anyone to make connection therewith without the consent of the board; but it determines the circumstances under which the council shall permit the work to be done, but leaves the time and manner of doing it to the control of the board of public works. Zube v. Weber, 67 Mich. 52, 34 N. W. 264.

The supplement of March 11, 1893, to Laws 1882, p. 60, authorizing a city, when building a sewer, to construct the necessary house connections from the sewer to the curb line of the lots fronting on the street, and charge the costs and expenses to the house peculiarly benefited thereby, is not unconstitutional on the ground of authorizing an arbitrary assessment irrespective of benefits. Van Wagoner v. Paterson, 67 N. J. L. 455, 51 Atl. 922.

1. Wrongful acts.

Persons constructing a public drain must keep within the limits of the land given, purchased, or condemned for the purpose of the drain, and are guilty of trespass if they throw earth upon land lying without such limits. Clark v. Wiles, 54 Mich. 323, 20 N. W. 63.

A drainage commissioner is personally liable as a trespasser for entering upon and constructing a ditch across the roadway of a turnpike company under authority of a judgment in a proceeding establishing a ditch and ordering its construction, where the judgment is void as to the company because it was not made a party to the proceedings. Cottingham v. Fortville & N. Turnp. Co. 112 Ind. 522, 14 N. E. 479.

Turnpike trustees are liable for negligently constructing drains with insufficient catch basins, whereby adjoining land is flooded although acting for the public benefit. Whitehouse v. Fellows, 10 C. B. N. S. 765, 30 L. J. C. P. N. S. 306, 4 L. T. N. S. 177, 9 Week. Rep. 557.

A township is not legally liable for illegalities in the proceedings to lay out and establish a drain, or for the misdoings of its officers in collecting the tax for benefits. Taylor v. Avon Twp. 73 Mich. 604, 41 N. W. 703.

A drainage district, in the absence of statutory liability, is not liable to the owner of land lying within the same, for damages thereto by flooding caused by the wrongful act of the commissioners in enlarging such district and connecting the drainage of the additional territory with the ditches cut through such owner's land, thereby increasing the volume of flow of water beyond the capacity of such ditches. Elmore v. Drainage Comrs. 135 Ill. 269, 25 N. E. 1010.

A county is not liable for the negligence of the contractor to whom the work of excavating a drain is let, or for his failure to do the work in accordance with the plan adopted, to one whose land is flooded as the result of such imperfect work. Thompson v. Polk County, 38 Minn. 130, 36 N. W. 267.

A drainage district is not liable for the wrongful and unlawful acts of its agents done in the execution of corporate duties or powers, in the absence of express statutory liability. It is a public, involuntary, quasi corporation. McGillis v. Willis, 39 Ill. App. 311.

Drainage commissioners are not personally liable for the overflow of an owner's land caused by the construction by contractors of a dam necessary in prosecuting the work of the district, where they merely acted under the order of the court in letting the contract for the work, and had no immediate supervision of its execution. Ibid.

A county is not liable in damage for negligently constructing or failing to keep open a ditch constructed under authority of Iowa Code, § 1207, authorizing the construction of ditches whenever they shall be conducive to the public health, convenience, or welfare, by reason of the overflow of plaintiff's crops. Dashner v. Mills County, 88 Iowa, 401, 55 N. W. 468.

A county is not liable for negligence in the construction of a drain across a highway upon the ground that it is a territorial and political division of the state created for governmental purposes, and gave no assent to its creation; and, since the county itself is not liable, its agents cannot be made liable. Packard v. Volts, 94 Iowa, 277, 62 N. W. 757.

Drainage districts organized under the drainage laws of Illinois are mere public involuntary quasi corporations, and not private corporations, and are not liable to respond in damages to an individual, injured by the negligence or wrongful acts of its officers, agents, or servants in turning water out of its natural channel through ditches to the injury of adjoining owners. Elmore v. Drainage Comrs. 135 Ill. 269, 25 N. E. 1010, Affirming 32 Ill. App. 122.

A drainage district is not liable for damages to an owner of land lying outside the same from overflow caused by the wrongful and injurious manner in which a district levee was constructed so as to obstruct the natural flow of water. The remedy is against the commissioners personally. Santa Fé Drainage Dist. v. Waeltz, 41 Ill. App. 575.

Drainage commissioners, although acting as public servants, carrying out a public purpose, are liable for the negligence of their servants whereby adjoining lands are flooded. Coe v. Wise, L. R. 1 Q. B. 711, 37 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 262, 14 L. T. N. S. 891, 7 Best & S. 831, Reversing 5 Best & S. 440, 33 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 281, 10 Jur. N. S. 1019, 10 L. T. N. S. 666, 12 Week. Rep. 1036, where it was held that drainage commissioners acting without reward, having employed skillful and competent persons in constructing and maintaining a sluice near the opening of a cut for the purpose of excluding tidal waters, are not liable for the negligence of their agents which results in the bursting of the sluice whereby tidal waters come in and flood the neighboring lands.

Drainage commissioners are liable for the entire damages resulting from the flooding of lands caused by the negligent construction of their works, although the damages may have been increased by the act of different landowners in attempting to protect their property from the action of the water, as, although such adjoining owners may have been wrongdoers, the primary cause of the injury was the negligence of the commissioners, and the damages cannot be apportioned between the several wrongdoers. Collins v. Middle Level Comrs. L. R. 4 C. P. 279, 38 L. J. C. P. N. S. 236, 20 L. T. N. S. 442.

A drain commissioner who casts upon land water which does not belong there is liable in damages to the owner, unless he provides a proper outlet to take it away from the premises. Chapel v. Smith, 80 Mich. 100, 45 N. W. 69.

If a surveyor of a highway without the approbation of the selectmen cause a water course occasioned by the wash of the highway to be constructed on the side of the road and within its limits, to the inconvenience of an abutting owner, the remedy is not by common-law action, but under the statutes forbidding such act. Benjamin v. Wheeler, 15 Gray, 486.

One whose land is not injured by the construction of a drain may not maintain an action against the drainage commissioner to enjoin its completion. Swan Creek Twp. v. Brown (Mich.) 9 Det. L. N. 52, 90 N. W. 38.

A property owner will not be left to an action against a drain commissioner to recover damages resulting from the flooding of his land due to the construction of a ditch with an inadequate outlet, but he is entitled to an injunction restraining the construction of the drain. Brugink v. Thomas, 125 Mich. 9, 83 N. W. 1019.

When the construction of an engine for the purpose of draining lands into a river is not of itself a nuisance, but its operation may result in injury to the navigation, and in flooding other lands, the possibility of its so doing being uncertain, the party asking that the construction of the engine be restrained must do so in the first instance before work upon it has commenced; but, if he delays application to the court until after that time, he must first prove the injury by an action at law. Ripon v. Hobart, 3 Myl. & K. 169, 8 L. J. Ch. N. S. 145, Co-op. Sel. Cas. 333.

So, where complainant, in asking for an injunction restraining the construction of engines for the purpose of draining land into a river, on the ground that such drainage would injure the navigation and flood the land, contended that the construction of the engine, and not merely its operation, should be restrained, it cannot have such relief, where it has delayed the proceedings to procure it until after large sums of money have been expended in the construction of the engine. Ibid.

It is no answer to a charge of negligent construction of a municipal ditch so that injury results to say that it was constructed under authority of law, compensation having been tendered for the land taken. Stonehouse v. Ennis-killen Twp. 32 U. C. Q. B. 562.

The landowners upon whose petition drainage proceedings were instituted and a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction obtained establishing a ditch and ordering its construction are not liable in a civil action for damages for injuries resulting to the land of another by its overflow from the ditch, upon a reversal of the judgment establishing it on the ground of error, and a dismissal of the proceedings upon appeal, during the pendency of which the ditch was constructed, where the appeal was taken by such landowner without a stay of proceedings, and no showing is made that such petitioners have, by means of the erroneous judgment, received benefits in excess of the amount paid by them for the construction of the ditch equal to the amount of such owner's damages, or that such damages inured to the special benefit of their

The owner of land is not liable criminally for obstructing an attempt of an overseer of the roads to construct a ditch through his farm for the purpose of draining a public road, there being no natural drainway through his land, when there is no authority given by the public laws for either entry upon or compensation for land taken for such a purpose. State v. New, 130 N. C. 731, 41 S. E. 1033.

j. Compensation for injury.

Under § 384 of the local government act of 1874, the owners and occupiers of land injured by the construction of a ditch or drain authorized by the statute are entitled to recover compensation, not only for past damages, but for all future and prospective damages. Colac v. Summerfield (1893) A. C. 187.

If, by reason of the unskillful construction of a drainage canal, the land upon which it is constructed is rendered less valuable, the owner is entitled to damages therefor, to be measured by the difference between the value of his farm before the ditch was dug and after it was dug. Bungenstock v. Nishnabotna Drainage Dist. 163 Mo. 198, 64 S. W. 149.

But a drainage district is not liable to an owner of land lying within the same for the flooding of his land by the construction of district levees. The remedy must be enforced against those causing the injury. Russell & A. Drainage Dist. v. Pinkstaff, 41 Ill. App. 504.

If the statute, in giving a municipal corporation power to improve a stream to prevent its overflow, provides a method of assessing damages, that method is exclusive, and an action at law cannot be maintained for the injury. Boston Belting Co. v. Boston, 149 Mass. 44, 20 N. E. 320.

The Massachusetts drainage laws provide no remedy where, for the purpose of draining certain land, a ditch is dug which throws the water onto lands of persons not parties to the proceeding. Day v. Hulburt, 11 Met. 321.

Under a statute providing that, in fixing compensation for the injury done by laying out a sewer, regard shall be had to all damages done to the property, whether by taking such property or injuring it in any manner, compensation must be allowed for injury done by the draining of a well, although no land of its owner is taken. Blickford v. Hyde Park, 173 Mass. 552, 54 N. E. 343.

A statute empowering canal commissioners to hear and determine the claim of a certain person for damages sustained by the appropriation of land for the deposit of shale and stone taken from a river in the prosecution of work for draining certain marshes for private benefit will not give them authority to include damages for destruction of property by fire negligently set out by workmen engaged in prosecuting the work upon property of the claimant not taken. People ex rel. Wasson v. Schuyler, 69 N. Y. 242.

In the absence of any authorized declarations to the contrary, it will be assumed that the rights of riparian proprietors in a stream are not lost, so far as they are capable of subsisting therein, by the action of drainage commissioners in improving the bed of the stream. Palmer v. Perse, Ir. Rep. 11 Eq. 616.

The fact that, after the passage of an act for the drainage of a marsh, the stream through which the water flows is appropriated for canal purposes, the effect of which is that in case the marsh is drained away from the stream mill sites along its course will be injured, will not give the mill owners the right to injunction against such drainage,—especially where they have an adequate remedy at law to ascertain and collect any damage for injuries sustained by them. French v. Kirkland, 1 Paige, 117.

The question of compensation for injuries done usually arises with respect to the right and duty as to drainage, and additional authorities will be found in the note on that subject post, —, and in the one on rights and duties of municipalities in the respect to surface water, post, —.

k. Other matters.

Mandamus will not lie to compel the construction of a drainage ditch, on behalf of one who is not shown to have any interest in the improvement independent of that which he has in common with the public at large. Van Horn v. State ex rel. Allen, 51 Neb. 232, 70 N. W. 941.

A taxpayer cannot compel a committee of the common council to proceed with the construction of a sewer for which an ordinance has been passed, where the council refuses to compel it to do so, and resists the attempt to compel it to do so. Congregation of St. Vincent de Paul v. Bordentown Street & Sewer Committee, 56 N. J. L. 48, 27 Atl. 799.

The judgment of the original petitioners for the establishment of a public ditch as to the lands affected thereby is not conclusive so as to deprive others actually affected thereby of the right to be made parties to the proceedings. Zumbro v. Parnin, 141 Ind. 430, 40 N. E. 1085.

A township, made liable under the drainage law for the assessment of benefits to highways by the construction of a ditch, is a necessary party to the ditch proceedings, and, for the purpose thereof, must be regarded as a property owner with all the rights given by law to such owners. Ibid.

An application to establish a ditch is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and, in order to authorize the court to make an order therein, the persons upon whose lands the ditch is to be constructed must be before the court, either by notice or appearance; and this applies as well to orders concerning others who are before the court, for the reason that a ditch is an entire thing, and, in order to establish it, all the necessary parties must be before the court,—especially where the statute authorizing such ditches provides for an allotment, to those affected, of the construction of portions thereof. Wright v. Wilson, 95 Ind. 408.

The statute of limitations will not run against the liability of a city under its agreement, upon voluntarily purchasing with drainage warrants a plant for purifying its drainage system, to facilitate the collection of assessments, and not to divert such collections from payment of the warrants, until it repudiates the trust, although judgments are substituted for the warrants against its own property. New Orleans v. Warner, 175 U. S. 120, 44 L. ed. 96, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 44.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run for injury caused by a ditch at the time the ditch was dug, when the evidence shows that no damage resulted until several years later. Miller v. Keokuk, & D. M. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 680, 16 N. W. 567.

The statute of limitations begins to run against an action to recover damages for the insufficient construction of a ditch in such a manner that the flow is so great as to cause the water to cut the earth away backward up the stream by an adjoining owner, as soon as it becomes apparent that such will be the result of the action of the water, although his land is not yet affected. Powers v. Council Bluffs, 45 Iowa, 652, 24 Am. Rep. 792.

Where damage results to a landowner from the construction of a sewer or ditch on the land which is taken for that purpose, the cause of action accrues, and the statute of limitations commences to run, at the time of the construction of the ditch, and not at the time that the injury is actually sustained. Dallas v. Ross, 2 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) § 279, p. 211.

A drainage commissioner appointed under a drainage law to construct a ditch has no power, nor is it his duty, to build a bridge over the ditch at a highway crossing, and pay for it out of the ditch funds, where neither the act under which the ditch is established, nor any other act, makes it his duty to build such bridges, and no provision is made for the collection of money for that purpose, notwithstanding the township in which the bridge lies is assessed for the construction of the ditch. Rigney v. Fischer, 113 Ind. 313, 15 N. E. 594.

When a farm drainage district acquires by condemnation an outlet for the water collected in its drains outside of the district by enlarging and deepening a natural channel across the lands of another, rendering the same impassable which before was passable, such outlet becomes, by operation of law, one of the ditches of the district for all the purposes for which it was acquired, and its duty to bridge the same attaches the same as if it were within the district, and, being its duty, the cost of a bridge was not an element of damage awarded the owner of such land in the condemnation proceeding; and hence, such district can be required to build and maintain a bridge or proper passageway over the same. Union Drainage Dist. v. O'Reilly, 132 Ill. 631, 24 N. E. 426.

The legislature may authorize a drainage district to remove a county bridge across a stream which it is necessary to widen for drainage purposes, and require the county to replace it at its own expense. Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties, 193 Ill. 439, 58 L. R. A. 353, 62 N. E. 201.

In a proceeding to establish a public drain, the burden of proof of matters set forth by the petition, by the report of the viewers, but controverted in remonstrances, is on the petitioners. Trittip v. Beaver, 155 Ind. 652, 58 N. E. 1034.

VIII. Supervision by court.

a. By appeal.

Many of the statutes contain provision for a review of some portion, at least, of the drainage proceedings by direct appeal to the courts. In such cases the procedure and the questions which are open are entirely governed by the statute.

A provision in a statute authorizing municipal corporations to construct sewers by special assessments, which provides that upon appeals from precepts issued for their collection no question of fact shall be tried which may arise prior to the making of the contract for the improvement, renders it incompetent for the appellate court to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings had before the contract was let; and such provision is constitutional and valid, since such questions can be settled before the contract is let. Allen County v. Silvers, 22 Ind. 491.

The right of appeal in a landowner whose land had been assessed for the construction of a drain, and who is named in the assessment, from the decision of the commissioners that the drain will be of public utility and ordering the same to be established, cannot be cut off on the ground that his name is not on the petition for its establishment, and, therefore, he is not a party to the proceedings, since the act of assessing his land and including his name upon the assessment roll brings him into the proceedings, and makes him a party thereto. Houk v. Barthold, 73 Ind. 21.

Some of the courts find authority for the appeal under general statutes.

The county commissioners are charged with a judicial duty to hear and determine the question of the public utility of a proposed drain, and not with discretionary power, under the statute, to enable owners of wet lands to drain the same, which provides that if, upon a hearing, the county commissioners "become satisfied" that the contemplated ditch is of public utility, they shall appoint appraisers, etc., and persons aggrieved by their decision may appeal therefrom, although the statute makes no provision for an appeal from such decision. Bryan v. Moore, 81 Ind. 9.

A landowner affected by the decision of county commissioners that a proposed drain will be of public utility is entitled to an appeal from that decision and a trial de novo in the appellate court, although the statute under which the proceedings are had does not expressly give the right of appeal from such order, since the appeal may be taken under the general statute allowing appeals from decisions. Meehan v. Wiles, 93 Ind. 52.

An act providing for the construction of drainage ditches does not seek to deprive the owners of property of the same without due process of law in the violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States because it makes no provisions for confirming and contesting the charge imposed, in the courts, when a remedy is given such owners under 2 Ballinger, Anno. Codes & Statutes, §§ 5740-5757, by writ of certiorari. State v. Henry, 28 Wash. 38, 68 Pac. 368.

Upon an appeal by a landowner from an assessment by appraisers of the benefits to his land by the construction of a drain, the case must be tried de novo, and the report of the appraisers is not proper evidence to sustain the assessment, and raises no prima facie presumption of its correctness. McKinsey v. Bowman, 58 Ind. 88; Beck v. Pavey, 69 Ind. 304.

A petition for the establishment of a ditch over the lands of others, which fails to allege that the same will be of public benefit or utility, goes to the jurisdiction of the county commissioners; but, as they had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, it is competent for the circuit court, upon appeal from their decision, to allow the petition to be amended so as to supply the omission. Coolman v. Fleming, 82 Ind. 117.

Where an appeal from a sewer assessment is required to be made within three months, upon one month's notice to the municipal corporation in writing, it is not sufficient to merely serve the notice within the three months. Custy v. Lowell, 117 Mass. 78.

The statute of 23 Hen. VIII., passed for the reclamation of marsh lands, which provided for a system of drainage, and conferred power upon the commissioners to levy taxes and assessments for the drains and to enforce payment by distraint, did not give the persons taxed the right to take their taxation by appeal before a jury for revision. Bishop v. Tripp, 16 R. I. 198, 14 Atl. 79.

An appeal does not lie from the determination of the board of supervisors that land was in the vicinity of a ditch constructed under authority of a statute to change the direction of a water course, and therefore liable to a tax of the cost of the ditch, where the statute allows an appeal in favor of certain persons affected by the proceeding, but none in favor of the tax payers. Lambert v. Mills County, 58 Iowa, 666, 12 N. W. 715.

Under statutes which contemplate an appeal to the courts in drainage proceedings from decisions of the board of commissioners, the court and jury succeed to all the substantial duties which devolved upon the viewers before the commissioners, so that matters stand for trial de novo and a finding or direction in detail upon all matters in issue between the parties is contemplated. Hardy v. McKinney, 107 Ind. 364, 8 N. E. 232.

b. On collateral attack.

There is very little hope of success in attempting to induce a court to review the doings of drainage officers on collateral attack. The method pointed out by the statute for direct review must be followed, or the defects must be such as to destroy the proceedings completely, to receive aid from the court.

When the matter of establishing sewer districts is intrusted by the legislature to the common council, its action is conclusive on a collateral attack. Heman v. Schulte, 166 Mo. 409, 66 S. W. 163.

Equity will not interfere with the discretion of commissioners appointed under an act for the drainage of drowned land as to the best method to effect the drainage. Phillips v. Wickham, 1 Paige, 590.

The building of public sewers by a municipal corporation is the exercise of a legislative discretion, and courts of chancery have no power to control this discretion, or compel the construction of sewers in particular localities or directions, no matter how badly the same are needed. Horton v. Nashville, 4 Lea, 39, 40 Am. Rep. 1.

The selection of the route of a public ditch being vested by statute within the discretionary power of county commissioners, the practicability of the route selected by them in the exercise of that discretion is not reviewable by the court in the absence of its abuse. Selecting the line of a former ditch is not such an abuse. Sample v. Carroll, 132 Ind. 496, 32 N. E. 220.

The location of a public ditch upon the best, cheapest, and most available route, being a matter left by statute to the jurisdiction of the county commissioners, is not, in the absence of fraud, subject to review by the courts. Chandler v. Beal, 132 Ind. 596, 32 N. E. 597.

A landowner cannot maintain a suit to set aside a sale of his land for delinquent taxes levied for the construction of a ditch, on the ground that the contractor did not properly perform the work, or that the drain was not of public benefit or utility or conducive to the public health and was never found to be such, without showing that he ever paid or offered anything for the work done on his land, or that the same was sold without legal authority. The proceedings establishing the ditch, and the decision of a competent authority that the work was completed, cannot be thus collaterally attacked. Simonton v. Hays, 88 Ind. 70.

An ordinance of a municipal corporation for the construction of a sewer with an outlet in a stream cannot, in a proceeding to confirm a special assessment for the construction of the same, be declared invalid on the ground that the discharge of sewage into such stream will so pollute the water thereof as to be a nuisance to the cities and towns on the stream below. Walker v. Aurora, 140 Ill. 402, 29 N. E. 741.

It is entirely within the discretion of the drain commissioner to fix the width or depth of a drain, or to decide to what extent a stream may be deepened or widened so as to drain adjoining land, and the courts cannot substitute their judgment for that of the commissioner. Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. W. 22.

In an action to restrain the collection of an assessment for the construction by a municipal corporation of a culvert, the improper construction or inadequacy of the culvert are not subjects of review by the court, as such matters are wholly for the consideration of the city council. Murphey v. Wilmington, 5 Del. Ch. 281.

The courts will not examine the proceedings generally of boards of commissioners of drainage districts on sweeping allegations of irregularity, but will presume them to be legal and regular unless expressly attacked on specific grounds. De Gravelle v. Iberia & St. M. Drainage Dist. 104 La. 703, 29 So. 302.

A court of equity will not interfere by injunction to prevent the construction of a sewerage system according to a comprehensive plan with an outlet deemed suitable and proper, adopted in good faith by city officers in the exercise of discretion and in accordance with their judgment after due consideration, solely on the ground that the outlet thus chosen was ill judged, and that a continuous nuisance to the plaintiff would inevitably result therefrom, such outlet being down the stream from, and not on, the plaintiff's premises. Soden v. Emporia, 7 Kan. App. 583, 52 Pac. 461.

The decision of the supervisors that a drainage ditch was completed to the required depth and width is conclusive in the absence of fraud or improper practices. Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 477.

But in Indiana it was held that the report of drainage commissioners that a ditch has been fully completed according to the contract and to the plans and specifications is not conclusive, but, upon exceptions filed by landowners there-to, the question may be tried by the court, and the report rejected if there are material departures from such plans and specifications. Racer v. Wingate, 138 Ind. 114, 36 N. E. 538.

The determination of a city council as to the amount of land necessary to be taken for a proposed sewer outlet is not final, but is subject to review by the court. Bennett v. Marlon, 106 Iowa, 628, 76 N. W. 844.

The courts have the power to determine, as a question of law, whether the exercise by a municipal corporation of a general power "to regulate the construction, repairs, and use of vaults, cisterns, areas, hydrants, pumps, sewers, and gutters" is reasonable or arbitrary, unreasonable, and oppressive. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Chicago, 162 Ill. 505, 44 N. E. 832.

An ordinance providing for the construction of a district sewer to connect with a stream or ravine is not conclusive as to the character of such stream as a natural course of drainage under a municipal charter declaring that district sewers must connect with another sewer or with the natural course of drainage; but such question is one for the determination of the court. Bayha v. Taylor, 36 Mo. App. 427.

The fact that a contractor building a sewer employs members of the common council at high wages as superintendents of the work for the purpose of influencing the council to accept the work though not properly done, and does so influence them, amounts to fraud, and is a defense to an action for collection of assessments. Green v. Shanklin, 24 Ind. App. 608, 57 N. E. 269.

The order of a board of supervisors creating the district for the reclamation of swamp lands is an act of legislation in the exercise of the taxing or police power of the state which is not reviewable by certiorari. Williams v. Sacramento County, 65 Cal. 160, 3 Pac. 667.

Where the statute permits an appeal to the courts from a judgment assessing damages in a drainage proceeding, such remedy will be regarded as adequate as to all errors which may be reviewed thereby, so that certiorari will not lie, although the lien of the judgment may attach to the property assessed pending the appeal. State ex rel. Nelson v. King County Super. Ct. (Wash.) 71 Pac. 601.

IX. Acquisition of funds.

a. Use of public funds or credit.

Many of the grants of swamp land by the general government to the respective states contained a provision that the proceeds of sales should be used to drain and reclaim the lands. The question has arisen how far such provision could be enforced by purchasers.

A purchaser of swamp land cannot complain that the money paid for his scrip was not appropriated to the reclamation of his land by the construction of levees under the act of Congress of March 16, 1852, since the duty imposed by that statute upon the swamp-land commissioners to levee and drain overflowed lands is general, and for the public good. Baugh v. Lamb, 40 Miss. 493.

An individual, although living in the vicinity of swamp and overflowed lands, may not, although he alleges that the health of himself and family is injuriously affected by ponds which could be removed by proper drains, insist upon the application of the proceeds of the sale of such lands to their drainage, although in the grant of the land by the United States to the state the proceeds were to be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the purpose of reclaiming the lands. If the United States is satisfied with the disposition which the state has made, or authorized to be made, of these lands, individual citizens must remain content. Barrett v. Brooks, 21 Iowa, 144.

An individual citizen may not maintain an act to enforce a trust charged by the United States as donor upon the swamp lands granted to the states and by them to the county, to apply the proceeds of the sale, as far as necessary, to the draining and reclaiming of such lands, when he has accepted a conveyance of the lands from the county without requiring a covenant or agreement to drain or reclaim the lands. Keltner v. Story County, 28 Iowa, 35.

Under the provisions of an act of Congress granting all the swamp and overflowed public land unfit thereby for cultivation to the states in which the same are located, and directing the issuing of a patent therefor, a fee-simple estate passed to such lands to the states availing themselves of the privileges of that act; and the fact that such act provided that the proceeds of the sale of such land by the states should be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the purposes of reclaiming the land by means of drains and levees does not limit or qualify the power of the state legislature over them and their proceeds to dispose of as they see fit, but is, at the utmost, but the expression of a wish or desire on the part of Congress that such proceeds should be so expended, but not making it a condition of the grant. Whiteside County v. Burchell, 31 Ill. 68.

A purchaser of swamp land who acquired his title thereto under the existing system of disposing of the swamp lands of the state, which provided that the proceeds from such sales should be applied in reclaiming such lands by the construction of drains, and that the same should be laid out in districts and the work let to the lowest bidder, and, if a purchaser thereof is the lowest bidder, that he be allowed to pay his purchase price in that way, but, if not the lowest bidder, that he should pay cash or execute his note and mortgage therefor,—cannot compel the county in which his lands are located to take its pay for notes given by him in labor in ditching the lands, where no contract exists between him and the county giving him that right, and the county never called for bidders to reclaim such lands, because, by subsequent acts of legislature, the system was abandoned, and the proceeds diverted to other public objects. Ibid.

The right of the state of Illinois to grant to the several counties in the state the swamp and overflowed lands within their respective limits, title to which was derived under an act of Congress, and to remit to such counties the exclusive control over the same and over their proceeds, cannot be questioned by the courts. And, if such lands were granted to the state by Congress upon the trust that the proceeds thereof should be expended in reclaiming them, such trust, being of municipal, and not of judicial, concern, would be exclusively within the power of the state, which could not be compelled by the courts to execute such a trust. Ibid.

A purchaser of swamp lands cannot recover back the purchase price paid by him therefor on the ground of a breach of trust on the part of the county in diverting the proceeds from the swamp lands within its limits to other purposes than their drainage, since, by a former decision of the supreme court of Illinois (Whiteside County v. Burchell, 31 Ill. 68), it was decided that no such trust existed, and that the purchasers of swamp lands from the county were remediless. Bureau County v. Thompson, 39 Ill. 566.

A purchaser of swamp lands from a county, who executed his notes for the purchase price, cannot plead a want of consideration therefor because the county did not use the proceeds from the sale of its swamp lands for their reclamation, where, by subsequent legislation, the policy of the state with reference to swamp lands has changed, and the laws in force when such purchase was made, requiring the counties to appropriate the proceeds from the sale of such lands in their respective counties to their reclamation, were repealed, and the counties were given full control over such lands with the right to apply the proceeds therefrom to other public objects if deemed best. Newell v. Bureau County, 37 Ill. 253.

But where swamp and overflowed lands granted by the general government to a state, and by the state to the several counties, are conveyed by a county to a company, incorporated for such purpose, on the condition that such company, in addition to paying a specified sum of money therefor, will drain the lands, the latter takes the lands burdened with the trust arising under such condition, and a court of chancery will require it to account for the funds received from the sale of such lands, where the company fails to execute such trust, but sells portions of the land and divides the remainder among the members thereof, the contract for draining being too vague and uncertain to justify a decree of specific performance. Henry County v. Winnebago Swamp Drainage Co. 52 Ill. 455.

It is no defense to an action for an assessment against landowners in a reclamation district, that the Arkansas act granting swamp lands to the state of California provided that the proceeds of the sale of such lands should be used, as far as necessary, for the reclamation thereof, as no contract or trust was created thereby which such assessment impairs, and, even if such a contract was thereby created, such owners, not being parties thereto, cannot complain. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 86 Cal. 54, 4 Pac. 945.

In some instances municipal corporations are authorized to make drainage improvements and raise the funds by the issuance of their own bonds.

A city having the right to make regulations to secure the general health of the city, and the authority to construct sewers, keep them in repair, and regulate their use, may issue bonds to provide the necessary money for the construction of a sewer for the purpose of draining one of its streets. State ex rel. Norfolk v. Babcock, 22 Neb. 614, 35 N. W. 941.

An act providing for an issue of bonds by three several towns to an arbitrary maximum amount each, the proceeds of which are to be used in paying, as it progressed, for work on a sewer draining an area embraced in them all, on the completion of which work the total expense incurred is to be apportioned according to benefits conferred, and the excess or deficiency in the amount of bonds issued to carry it on is to be adjusted by the assessors, is not a delegation of legislative powers, nor does it confer on the assessors power to fix debts on the towns; hence, assessments made pursuant to it are valid. State, King, Prosecutor, v. Reed, 43 N. J. L. 186, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370.

Drainage of creeks, swamps, and ponds around a city, and the construction of sewers and waterworks, being methods by which the health, convenience, and comfort of the residents of the city are directly affected, are municipal purposes within the meaning of a charter, giving power to issue bonds for such purposes. Greeley v. Jacksonville, 17 Fla. 174.

Under the drainage laws of Illinois, a drainage district has no power to issue bonds, binding itself for the payment of an assessment made in one of its subdistricts for work done in and solely for the local benefit of such subdistrict. People ex rel. Pollard v. Swigert, 130 Ill. 608, 22 N. E. 787.

Although the drainage commissioners of a special drainage district have power, under the statute, to form subdistricts for the purpose of making assessments of benefits for the local work to be done therein, yet they are given no power to issue subdistrict bonds for an unpaid assessment, or any part thereof, made in one of such subdistricts. Ibid.

In other jurisdictions there is a direct prohibition of the loaning of the public credit for the making of local improvements.

A drainage law which provides for payment of the cost of the work from the proceeds of bonds to be issued by the county, which is to be repaid by special assessments laid under the law, violates a constitutional prohibition against the loaning of county credit; and it is immaterial that the county might have originally been made liable for the whole cost. Martin v. Tyler, 4 N. D. 278, 25 L. R. A. 838, 60 N. W. 392; Bye v. Stafford, 4 N. D. 304, 60 N. W. 401.

But under § 7 of the drainage law of North Dakota (Laws 1895, being chap. 51), which provides that the county drain commissioners may issue warrants drawn upon the county treasurer and payable out of the drainage fund (which could be raised only by special assessments within a limited district), and negotiate the same, for the purpose of raising funds with which to pay damages allowed for right of way for drains, such warrants would create no general liability against the county, and their issuance would not constitute a loan of the credit of the county, within the meaning of § 185 of the state Constitution. Redmon v. Chacey, 7 N. D. 231, 73 N. W. 1081.

A statute providing for the reclamation of swamp or overflowed lands upon petition of the owners, and directing that the expense be borne by the lands benefited, except such part as might be assessed to the county at large on account of the benefit accruing to it, and empowering the county to issue bonds in lieu of immediate taxation for the improvement, does not authorize the county to loan its credit to any company, association, or corporation in violation of the state Constitution. Shelley v. St. Charles County, 5 McCrary, 474, 17 Fed. 909.

The legislature may appropriate money from the state treasury to aid in paying the cost of providing a system for sewage disposal embracing in its benefits a number of cities, towns, and a large population. Kingman, Petitioner, 153 Mass. 566, 12 L. R. A. 417, 27 N. E. 778.

Public sewers should be constructed by taxes levied upon the property of the whole city. Johnson v. Duer, 115 Mo. 371, 21 S. W. 800.

A municipal corporation which has authority to divide the city into sewerage districts in such manner as the council may determine may constitute the whole municipality one district. Grimmell v. Des Moines, 57 Iowa, 144, 10 N. W. 330.

Where the cost of lateral sewers has been assessed to abutting property, but the main arteries have been constructed at the expense of the city, a plan to construct other sewers by a special tax upon the city at large is not inequitable. Grunewald v. Cedar Rapids (Iowa) 91 N. W. 1059.

A recommendation by the village board of health that sewers be constructed does not authorize the village authorities to pay for their construction out of the village treasury instead of by assessment upon the property benefited in the manner provided by law. Re Plattsburgh Taxpayers, 27 App. Div. 353, 50 N. Y. Supp. 356.

The imposition of a general tax upon the inhabitants of a city for the construction of a sewer cannot be upheld by reason of the inherent power of a city to impose taxation for the preservation of the public health or safety, but such power, if it exists, must be derived from its charter. Bryne v. Covington, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 33, 21 S. W. 1050.

The legislature has authority to provide that school lands benefited by the construction of drainage ditches, shall be taken into consideration in apportioning the cost of the improvements. State ex rel. Latimer v. Henry, 28 Wash. 38, 68 Pac. 368.

b. Local assessment.

1. Authority to make.

That the legislature has authority to authorize special assessments for local improvements is fully established by the authorities set out in the note to Heffner v. Cass & Morgan Counties (Ill.) 58 L. R. A. 353. The only question is as to how far the authority has been exercised or conferred upon some municipal subdivision.

Express legislative authority is necessary to authorize a municipal corporation to assess the expenses of a sewer upon abutting property. Watertown v. Fairbanks, 65 N. Y. 588.

When sewers have been constructed according to a plan devised pursuant to a statute, and no fraud has occurred in any of the proceedings, nor any legal irregularity at all affecting the rights or interests of the owners, an assessment to defray the expense is valid. Re New York Protestant Episcopal Public School, 47 N. Y. 561.

An assessment for the construction of a drainage ditch cannot be made under the New York act of 1867, if the drainage commissioners acquired no title to the land across which the ditch was constructed. People ex rel. Williams v. Haines, 49 N. Y. 587.

The fact that 25 acres of land not originally included within the lines of a sewer district have been drained into a sewer constructed as a district sewer does not render it a public sewer so as to relieve owners of property within the district from liability on their special tax. Heman v. Allen, 156 Mo. 534, 57 S. W. 559, Affirmed in 181 U. S. 402b, 45 L. ed. 922, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 645.

While an assessment for the expense of the drainage of certain land may, by reason of inveterate usage, be based otherwise than on benefits received, nevertheless, owners of land outside the district drained may not be assessed without giving them any voice in the management of the work. State, Benjamin, Prosecutor, v. Bog & Fly Meadow Co. (N. J. L.) 52 Atl. 215.

A provision in the drainage law of Illinois authorizing the assessing of railroad companies' rights of ways and tracks, and providing the method of classifying them in proportion to the benefits received by them, which is subject to review on appeal, and which provides that assessments based thereon, when levied, are likewise subject to appeal on the one question as to whether such tax exceeds the benefits, is not unconstitutional and void as violating the rule that special assessments shall not exceed the benefits, or that the whole costs of the improvement must not exceed the benefits. Illinois C. R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 129 Ill. 417, 21 N. E. 925.

An act of the legislature vesting the corporate authorities of cities and villages with power to construct and maintain drains, levees, dykes, and pumping works for drainage purposes by special assessment upon the property benefited thereby is not unconstitutional as exceeding the power granted by a clause in the Constitution authorizing cities, etc., to make local improvements by special assessment, but does not authorize such assessments to maintain the same, since the authority to pass such act is derived from an amendment to the Constitution authorizing the establishment of drainage districts, and vesting the corporate authorities thereof "with power to construct and maintain drains . . . by special assessments," which amendment controls as to assessments of this character regardless of the provisions of the original Constitution. Hyde Park v. Spencer, 118 Ill. 446, 8 N. E. 846.

Under a constitutional provision "that the general assembly may delegate the taxing power, with the necessary restriction, to the state's subordinate, political, and municipal corporations, to the extent of providing for their existence, maintenance, and well being," the legislature is not required to delegate the power to levy sewer taxes to city councils, but may delegate the power to a board of local improvement representing one of the improvement districts of a city; and an act is constitutional which provides that such board shall report to the city as to the cost of the improvement, and that the city council must levy a tax regarding such report, although the council has no discretion as to the levy of the tax; and where it falls to make the levy it may be compelled to do so by mandamus. Little Rock v. Little Rock Bd. of Improvement, 42 Ark. 153.

It is within the scope of the power of the board of trustees of a village to determine whether the removal of an old culvert and construction of a new one should be regarded as a local improvement to be paid for by special assessments. Shannon v. Hinsdale 180 Ill. 202, 54 N. E. 181.

The power of the general assembly to authorize local assessments in proportion to benefits conferred, for the drainage of lands, recognized under a former Constitution and prior legislation of the state of Ohio, and sanctioned by the urgent necessities of portions of the state, was not limited to authorizing its exercise by cities and villages by a constitutional provision that the general assembly should provide for the organization of cities and incorporated villages by general laws, and restrict their power of assessment so as to prevent abuse; since such provision contains no express grant of the power of assessment, and no affirmative declaration of its existence, to which the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, applies, but merely recognizes the general existence of the power, and, by providing against its abuse by such agencies, intended no restriction of its exercise to those agencies alone. Reeves v. Wood County, 8 Ohio St. 333.

A special assessment for the construction of the main artery of a sewer system of a particular district may not be levied and collected on the real estate of the district in advance of its completion, when the ordinance authorizing its construction, and providing for the assessment of the cost thereof, contemplated a completion before the levy was made. Sanborn v. Mason City, 114 Iowa, 189, 86 N. W. 286.

That a ditch was not legally laid out is not material, where the owner of the land crossed by it consented to the work, nor is it important that the parties interested did not originally agree as to the exact line of the ditch, if they consented to what was done. Freeman v. Weeks, 45 Mich. 335, 7 N. W. 904.

The California statute authorizing the assessment of reclaimed swamp land does not impair the obligation of any contract between the United States and California, or the United States and its patentees and grantees, or between such state and purchasers from it or grantees of the United States, or of any contract in the charter of the reclamation district. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 6 Sawy. 567, 4 Fed. 366.

A sewer constructed exclusively for the drainage of abutting lots does not, because it drains the surface water from the streets, lose its character of a local sewer, within the Ohio statutes declaring a local sewer to be the one intended for use exclusively for the drainage and accommodation of lots abutting thereon, as the city is not compelled to take care of surface water on the streets, but such water is a common enemy which abutting lot owners must themselves keep off, and the street is not a lot by itself distinct from the abutting lots, but belongs to the owners thereof subject to the public easement; and assessments for the construction of such a sewer are therefore void where assessed in proceedings by the board of public affairs without the action or concurrence of the council, under a statute dispensing with such action only in the case of trunk or main sewers. Cincinnati use of Deters v. Standard Wagon Co. 1 Ohio N. P. 387.

An ordinance providing for a special tax for the ascertained cost of a completed sewer is not directory, but mandatory to the extent that the tax may not be levied before the completion of the sewer. Sanborn v. Mason City, 114 Iowa, 189, 86 N. W. 286.

2. What is liable.

(a) In general.

All classes of real property are subject to as-assessment for local improvements unless there is some particular reason for exemption.

Land used as a wharf is liable to assessments for the construction of a sewer, although unconnected with it, where such sewer drains higher land of water which might otherwise flow over the wharf land to the river. Boeres v. Strader, 13 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 414.

The fact that a toll bridge drains directly into a river does not exempt it from liability to assessment for the construction of a sewer on the ground that it derives no benefit from the sewer, as it derives the general benefit and advantage of being accessible, and all its approaches and neighboring public ways being properly drained and cleansed. Hammersmith Bridge Co. v. Hammersmith, L. R. 6 Q. B. 230.

Assessments for the cost of a sewer are to be levied on parcels of land belonging to a railroad company aside from that made use of in carrying on business peculiar to railroading, and enforced in the same way as provided for any other property. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Lindquist (Iowa) 93 N. W. 103.

An assessment against lands of infants for the construction of a drain without the appointment of a guardian ad litem is not void so as to be subject to collateral attack. McBride v. State use of Clandy, 130 Ind. 525, 30 N. E. 699.

Where a township is separated, part of it being incorporated into a village, the liability to assessment for government drainage, the assessment for which had not been completed, is not a matter to be arbitrated on as being a debt of the township to which the village ought to contribute, but each corporation is bound to raise the amount assessed in respect to the land locally situated within it. Point Edward v. Barnia Twp. 44 U. C. Q. B. 461.

(b) By whom selected.

The methods of selecting the land upon which the assessment shall be laid are quite various, and the persons authorized to make the selection are usually disclosed by the method employed. The assessment may be laid upon all property abutting on the improvement, or upon all benefited, or upon all within a certain district; or a district may be organized to make the improvement, and all property within the district made to bear a share of the expense. The persons who are intrusted with the selection will, for the most part, be the representatives of the organization having the work in charge.

Whether property will be benefited by the construction of a sewer is a question within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislative department of a municipality, and, in the absence of fraud, cannot be reviewed by the courts. Prior v. Buehler & C. Constr. Co. (Mo.) 71 S. W. 205.

The city council's determination of the benefits to lands from the construction of a sewer is final and conclusive, and not reviewable by the court on appeal, under a statute not specifying that as one of the questions to be examined on appeal; and it is within the legislative power to deny its consideration. Klein v. Tuhey, 13 Ind. App. 74, 40 N. E. 144.

The finding made by the assessing committee of a city council as to the amount of benefits accruing to property respectively in the sewer district, from the construction of a main sewer, is, under the Ohio statutes, conclusive upon the courts unless fraud or great oppression is shown. Toledo use of Macgahan v. Ford, 20 Ohio C. C. 200.

The question of benefits to property in a city from the construction of a sewer having once been passed upon by the common council, under the authority of a statute empowering municipal corporations to construct sewers and provide for the payment of the cost by special assessment, to be levied by the common council upon such lands as may be benefited thereby in such equitable proportion as they may deem just, no other court or tribunal has any power, except in case of fraud or corruption, to review or pass upon it. Ft. Wayne v. Cody, 43 Ind. 197.

Stat. 1867, chap. 106, providing for the construction of sewers, the expense thereof to be met by the mayor and aldermen assessing the real estate along the line of the sewers and some other specially benefited land its proportionate share of the expense, is not unconstitutional on the ground that it authorizes an assessment exceeding the benefit received by the estate assessed. Smith v. Worcester, 182 Mass. 232, 65 N. E. 40.

Property is benefited by the construction of a sewer so as to be subject to assessment for its construction, although not strictly connected with it, when without it the service is inadequate, causing, in times of freshets, the sewage to back up and overflow streets, sidewalks, and cellars in the low lands, and even forcing gases and odors into houses situate on high lands as the premises in question are situate. Prior v. Buehler & C. Constr. Co. (Mo.) 71 S. W. 205.

The formation of sewer districts having been left by the legislature to the discretion of the mayor and council of a city, the establishment of a district will not be judicially interfered with because of the noninclusion therein of certain territory, in the absence of proof of actual fraud. Topeka v. Huntton, 46 Kan. 634, 26 Pac. 488.

The question of the invalidity of a sewer assessment by reason of the omission therefrom of persons benefited by the sewer cannot be raised in an action to recover money paid under protest upon such assessment. Kelso v. Boston, 120 Mass. 207.

That a person has a revocable license to enter his private drain into a sewer does not render it necessary to assess him for the improvement if it is not contemplated that he shall permanently avail himself of the sewer, and other accommodations are contemplated for his property. Fairbanks v. Fitchburg, 132 Mass. 42.

Drainage districts.

Provisions for farm drainage should be construed more strictly than those for sewers in cities. There is not the public necessity for them, and there is greater temptation to provide the drainage for the benefit of private individuals. So much is this so that it has been held that an act of legislature creating a drainage district within specified boundaries, and incorporating a company with power to levy taxes on all the lands within that district, equally, to defray the cost of such drainage, is within the constitutional prohibition against the taking of private property for public use without just compensation, and therefore void, where a large portion of the land in such district would be benefited very little, if at all, by such proposed drainage, and the objects and purposes of such act, passed without the knowledge and consent of such owners, and to the provisions of which they have never assented, do not even partake of a public nature, but are confined exclusively to the advantage of those owners whose lands would be greatly benefited thereby. Cypress Pond Draining Co. v. Hooper, 2 Met. (Ky.) 350.

So, the limits of a drainage district, empowered to levy a property tax which must be voted for, must be fixed with certainty and precision, a failure in this regard rendering the organization of such drainage district invalid, and any taxpayer residing within the district is a proper party to raise the question of its invalidity

Richard v. Cypremort Drainage Dist. 107 La. 657, 32 So. 27.

The statute allowing a supplemental petition to be filed after the report of the drainage commissioners, asking that lands not mentioned in the report, but which are affected by the drainage, be referred to the commissioners for assessment, should be so construed as to allow such a petition in the case of lands stricken from the report because the owners did not have proper notice. Osborn v. Maxinkuckee Lake Ice Co. 154 Ind. 101, 56 N. E. 83.

The determination by the county court on the organization of a drainage district that certain lands should not be included in the district is not such res judicata as will prevent the commissioners afterward, when the owners of such lands have made constructive application for annexation by joining their lands by ditches to the ditches of the district, from making the statutory order of annexation of such lands. People ex rel. Herman v. Bug River Special Drainage Dist. 189 Ill. 55, 59 N. E. 805.

An order of court fixing the boundaries of a drainage district, including all the lands that will be benefited thereby, does not become a final adjudication upon that question as to lands not mentioned in that proceeding, the owners of which were not parties thereto. Streuter v. Willow Creek Drainage Dist. 72 Ill. App. 561.

The land of an owner cannot lawfully be included in a drainage district, unless included by the owner signing the petition for organization of the district, or by having his name included in the petition as a landowner by the petitioners, or by having his name appear in the notice as required by the statute under which such district is organized; and such owner, or others whose lands are included, have the right to make an objection by a writ of certiorari. Sanner v. Union Drainage Dist. 175 Ill. 575, 51 N. E. 857, Reversing 64 Ill. App. 62.

Whether the project for the establishment of a ditch was more comprehensive, or embraced and affected more lands, than was necessary in order to accomplish the drainage of the petitioner's land in the cheapest and best manner, is a subject for the exclusive judgment of the commissioners of drainage, and their determination of that question is not reviewable by the court. Helck v. Voight, 110 Ind. 279, 11 N. E. 806.

The statutory authority of the township board upon the appeal of a landowner from an assessment for drain benefits as made by the drain commissioner, to correct any "error or inequality in the assessment," does not entitle it to exclude lands from the assessment district which the commissioner had determined were benefited; nor has it the power to determine the validity of the proceedings, or to change the per cent assessed upon the township at large. Thomas v. Walker Twp. Board, 116 Mich. 597, 74 N. W. 1048.

An agreement by the drainage commissioners of a district that none of the remaining land of an owner should ever be attached to the district or classified or taxed, whether he connected with the ditches of the district or not, is void, because it is a violation of a mandatory direction of a statute making it the duty of such commissioners to connect the land of an outside owner with a district whenever such owner connects his ditches with those of the others in the district. Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. v. People ex rel. Bodman, 133 Ill. 87, 27 N. E. 857.

Land within a drainage district not benefited by a system of ditches proposed to be provided therein because the level of the lands is such 60 L. R. A.

that the proposed ditches will not carry off the water therefrom are, nevertheless, subject to assessment for the improvement; the theory of the law being that the public health, convenience, and welfare are promoted by the improvement, —not simply that the lands of particular owners are rendered more valuable. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 90 N. W. 510.

The determination of drainage commissioners as to what land will be benefited by the drain so as to be subject to assessment therefor will, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive when called in question for the first time on the application for a judgment on the drainage assessment. Moore v. People, 106 Ill. 376.

It is said in Buckley v. Lorain County, 1 Ohio C. C. 251, that § 4491 of the Ohio Revised Statutes, providing that the court may correct any gross injustice in the apportionment made by commissioners for the construction of a ditch, was intended to meet and obviate the objection of the conclusiveness of the finding by the commissioners that the lands would be benefited.

The plan upon which drainage districts are organized, under the drainage laws of Illinois, is to have only such lands included within their boundaries as will in fact in some material degree be beneficially affected by the proposed drainage, so that the drainage commissioners, when they fix the boundaries to a drainage district, at the same time pass upon the question as to what lands will be benefited; and it is made their duty to exclude all lands in their judgment not benefited, and include all those benefited; and when their report has been confirmed by the county court, due notice of the application for confirmation being given to all persons interested, who are at liberty to appear and contest the proposed boundaries fixed, such decision, so long as it stands in full force and unreversed, is conclusive; and a jury impaneled to assess damages and benefits for proposed work in a drainage district so organized have nothing to do with the question as to whether or not land included therein would or would not in fact be benefited, but their duty is simply to apportion the entire benefits among the several tracts of land included in the district in the ratio in which benefits will result to the respective tracts from the improvement; and an attempt on their part to determine that only a portion of a particular tract is in fact benefited is extra-judicial and nugatory, and the assessment will be taken as having been made on the entire tract. Gauen v. Moredock & I. L. Drainage Dist. No. 1, 131 Ill. 446, 23 N. E. 633.

Certiorari lies to review the action of drainage commissioners in enlarging the boundaries of their district when no statutory means exist for reviewing such proceedings. Mason & T. Special Drainage Dist. v. Griffin, 184 Ill. 380, 25 N. E. 995.

Quo warranto is not the proper remedy to question the inclusion of land within a drainage district by order of court, unless it is alleged that the order was procured by fraud. People ex rel. Harrison v. Mineral Marsh Drainage Dist. 193 Ill. 428, 62 N. E. 225.

Enlargement of district.

The power of the legislature of a state to change and authorize the alteration of the boundaries of such quasi municipal corporations as drainage districts, and to extend the authority of the commissioners of the district so as to be coextensive with the district as changed, cannot be questioned under a constitutional provision authorizing the formation of drainage districts. People ex rel. Hardy v. Young America Drainage Dist. 143 Ill. 417, 32 N. E. 688.

It is within the power of drainage commissioners, under the Illinois drainage laws, to change the boundaries of a drainage district so as to include additional lands. Doyle v. Baughman, 24 Ill. App. 614.

Special drainage districts may be enlarged under the provisions of the Illinois drainage laws in the manner prescribed by such laws for the original organization of the district. Davenport v. Drainage Dist. 25 Ill. App. 92.

The jurisdiction of drainage commissioners to enlarge a drainage district under a section of the drainage law authorizing them to make such enlargement cannot be questioned on the ground that they are an interested tribunal. Scott v. People ex rel. Lewis, 120 Ill. 129, 11 N. E. 408.

The drainage laws of Illinois require the same notice to be given property owners for an enlargement of a drainage district as is required when the district is originally formed. Mason & T. Special Drainage Dist. v. Giffin, 28 Ill. App. 561.

But a late case has held that a resolution of drainage commissioners, attempting to change the boundaries of a drainage district as originally organized under the Illinois farm drainage act, is unauthorized and void. People ex rel. Bollweg v. Union Dist. No. 1 Drainage Comrs. 165 Ill. 156, 46 N. E. 261.

Drainage commissioners of a drainage district organized under the Illinois farm act have no power, after the original organization, to limit the district or change its boundaries, except under that provision of such act authorizing a dissolution; and a district in whole or in part cannot otherwise be dissolved. Ibid., Affirming 61 Ill. App. 416.

The drainage commissioners of a drainage district have the power, under the drainage laws of Illinois, to annex the lands of owners who have connected the drains on the same with those of the district, even though such lands may be in an adjoining township; and the fact that such commissioners are the highway commissioners of the township in which the district is situate, and that the owners of the annexed land in another township have no voice in their election, makes no difference, since they, having voluntarily applied to be included in the district by availing themselves of its benefits, must bear their fair portion of the burden. People ex rel. Hardy v. Young America Drainage Dist. 143 Ill. 417, 32 N. E. 688.

The legality of the action of drainage commissioners in enlarging a drainage district under the drainage law of a state cannot be questioned in a proceeding by such commissioners to collect special assessments upon the land thus added to the district. People ex rel. Wood v. Jones, 137 Ill. 35, 27 N. E. 294.

Under a provision in a drainage law of a state making it the duty of drainage commissioners to annex outside lands with a drainage district whenever the owner connects his land with the ditches of the district, it does not matter whether such connection is by joining his own ditches to those of the district or by draining his lands through such district in some other mode. Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. v. People ex rel. Bodman, 138 Ill. 87, 27 N. E. 857.

Although, under the drainage laws of Illinois, the owner of land outside a drainage district may connect ditches draining his own land with the district ditches, by the payment of such amount as the land would have been assessed if originally included in the district, and shall thereafter be considered as included in the district, yet he has no right to construct a ditch which will only serve as a channel through which to convey to said district ditches the drainage of lands, other than his own, not included in the district and not subject to assessment for the benefits thereby conferred upon them. Dayton v. Drainage Comrs. 128 Ill. 271, 21 N. E. 198.

An owner of land who widens and deepens a small ditch on his land which connects with the ditch of a drainage district so as to drain water from his land into the district ditch, which would not flow therein otherwise, will be deemed, under the drainage law of Illinois, to have voluntarily applied to be included within the district. People ex rel. Baron v. Drainage Dist. No. 3, 155 Ill. 45, 39 N. E. 613.

Landowners who connect ditches on their lands with a ditch upon the land of another, who has enlarged and deepened the same, so that water is carried from such other lands through such enlarged ditch into that of a drainage district which would not otherwise have flowed into such drainage ditch, will be deemed to have voluntarily applied to be included within the district. Ibid.

Landowners outside a drainage district are entitled to keep open, for the benefit of their lands, ditches on the same constructed before the organization of the district, without becoming liable under the law to be included within the district, provided they in no manner connect such ditches with the district ditch. Ibid.

Owners of land have the right to have the water that accumulates thereon to flow in its natural direction, and no presumption can arise that they have applied to be included within a drainage district from the fact that such water naturally flows into the district ditch; and this is true although they increased the flow by ditches or drains upon their own land. But they cannot construct ditches from the district ditch over their own land so as to carry off water in that direction which would naturally go in another direction without becoming liable, under the statute, to be connected with the district, and thus contribute to the expense of the improvements. Ibid.

A landowner who questions the right of drainage commissioners to annex his land to a drainage district because he has placed himself within the statutory provision authorizing such annexation whenever the owner of land connects a ditch or ditches on his own land with those of a drainage district must proceed by quo warranto, and cannot maintain a bill in equity to enjoin the commissioners from acting as such over his land. Bodman v. Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 132 Ill. 439, 24 N. E. 630.

In a proceeding to enlarge a drainage district, the decision of the commissioners that the lands so added are involved in the same system of drainage and require for outlet the drains of the district is not, in the absence of fraud, a subject of inquiry in quo warranto proceedings, where such commissioners are invested by law with the discretion of determining that question. People ex rel. Samuel v. Cooper, 139 Ill. 461, 29 N. E. 872.

The fact that a section of the drainage law, vesting the drainage commissioners with power to enlarge the boundaries of their district, fails to prescribe the mode of procedure or the notice to be given to the owners of land sought to be annexed, will not be construed as conferring upon such commissioners the power to annex such lands without giving the owners thereof the right to be heard upon the question whether a proper petition has been presented, and whether their lands are involved in the same system of drainage, and require for outlets the drains of the district; but such statute will be construed as requiring the same procedure and notice as are required in the organization of the original drainage district. Mason & T. Special Drainage

Dist. v. Griffin, 134 Ill. 330, 25 N. E. 995, Affirming 28 Ill. App. 561.

One who, having due notice of a hearing on a petition to annex his land to a drainage district, suffers default, cannot, on the hearing as to the amount of the assessment, insist that no assessments shall be made against him because his land is not benefited. Trigger v. Drainage Dist. No. 1, 193 Ill. 230, 61 N. E. 1114.

8. Procedure; method of assessment.

In laying assessments for the construction of drainage works the report of the engineer or surveyor must state with particularity, as nearly as may be in his opinion, the proportion of benefit to be derived from such drainage by every road and lot or portion of lot, not stating a lump sum for roads generally. Essex County v. Rochester Twp. 42 U. C. Q. B. 523.

One not a resident within the limits of any of the municipalities which embrace the area assessable for a sewer is not disqualified to act as assessor by reason of owning a mortgage on some of the land included in the sewer district. State, King, Prosecutor, v. Reed, 43 N. J. L. 180, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

The manner of making assessments on lands benefited by the construction of a sewer is left to the discretion of corporate authorities of a municipality, under a statute providing that the estimated cost and assessment shall be made upon the property benefited thereby in such equitable manner as the common council shall deem just. Elkhart v. Wickwire, 121 Ind. 331, 22 N. E. 342.

In the absence of any statutory direction as to how a sewer assessment is to be made, a power to make it by ordinance would seem to be incident to a power to charge the cost of construction upon abutting property. Erie v. Flint, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 482.

To be legal and effectual, an act authorizing the construction of a sewer must go beyond a mere direction to assess the cost, or a part of it, upon the lots drained, and establish some constitutional rule for apportioning the burden, designate the property out of which the tax is to be made, and fix some certain standard of assessment. The legislature cannot commit to the discretion of others the fixing of the method; and when, under a statute deficient in these respects, the sewer commissioners return an assessment as in their judgment just and equitable, without showing that it is confined to, or even imposed on, the property drained by the sewer, or alluding even to the benefits conferred, without any intimation that the assessment has any reference to benefits; and the fact is that it was made according to surface area of the proximate lots,—the assessment is invalid. State, New Brunswick Rubber Co., Prosecutor, v. New Brunswick Street & Sewer Comrs. 38 N. J. L. 190, 20 Am. Rep. 380.

A charter provision that sewer taxes shall be assessed upon the property specially benefited in an amount equal to the contract price of construction is not inconsistent with a further provision that the premises specially benefited by the improvement shall be assessed according to the benefits, where it is shown that the contract price does not exceed the whole amount of benefits derived by the property assessed. Adams v. Bay City, 78 Mich. 211, 44 N. W. 138.

A statutory provision authorizing the apportionment of a drain tax to be made upon the per cent of benefits to accrue, instead of in dollars and cents, is not unjust, where the drain is conducive and necessary to public health. Brady v. Hayward, 114 Mich. 326, 72 N. W. 233.

A statute designating a fixed sum per linear foot front as the basis of a sewer assessment to defray a portion of the cost of its construction is not unconstitutional as a taking of property without due process of law, although it fails to afford the taxpayer a hearing upon the rule or principle of apportionment. People ex rel. Scott v. Pitt, 169 N. Y. 521, 58 L. R. A. 372, 62 N. E. 662.

A statute authorizing the assessment of property abutting on a sewer for the cost thereof according to the front-foot rule is constitutional. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Lindquist (Iowa) 93 N. W. 103.

See further on this question note to Heffner v. Cass and Morgan Counties, 58 L. R. A. 353.

A direction by the common council that a sewer assessment be levied upon land within a designated portion of the city is not addressed to the assessors individually, and may be carried out by their successors in office. Hooker v. Rochester, 30 N. Y. Supp. 297.

The future improvement of land laid out for lots, but which still remains farming land in appearance, may be considered in assessing the property for a trunk sewer by which it is benefited. McKee Land & Improv. Co. v. Swilkehard, 23 Misc. 21, 51 N. Y. Supp. 399; McKee Land & Improve. Co. v. Williams, 63 App. Div. 553, 71 N. Y. Supp. 1141.

The correct rule to apply in the assessment of lands for artificial drainage is to assess such lands according to the amount of waterfall that needs artificial drainage so as to render it suitable for the purposes to which it may reasonably be put, and not by simply estimating the amount of its watershed. Blue v. Wentz, 54 Ohio St. 247, 43 N. E. 493.

The commissioners of sewers attempted to cut a new channel for a river and assess the expense upon several towns by general tax, so much to each town generally, and it was resolved that none could be taxed towards the reparation of sewers, but those who had prejudice, damage, or disadvantage by the nuisance or default, and who might have benefit and profit by the reformation or removal of them, and that the assessment ought to have these qualities: (1) It ought to be according to the quantity of the lands, tenements, and rents of the respective owners liable therefor, and by the number of acres and perches; (2) according to the rate of every person's portion, tenure, or profit, or the quantity of the common of pasture, of fishing, or other commodity; and therefore it was resolved that the tax generally of a several sum in gross upon the town was not warranted. Isle of Ely's Case, 10 Coke, 141.

The assessing of drainage assessments against a whole lot, or part of a lot, owned by one person, when only some of the acreage was benefited, for the value of such benefit, is not erroneous. Re McLean, 45 U. C. Q. B. 325.

On certiorari defendant justified distress for an acre tax, and whether this was good or not, and the court conceded this not a fit way, being to put the commissioners to inquire of the value of every acre. Commissioners of Sewers v. Newburg, 3 Keble, 827.

A provision of the drainage laws giving an appeal from the drainage commissioners' order confirming special assessments, to the county surveyor, treasurer, and sheriff, who are constituted an appeal board with power to inquire into and pass upon the amount of benefits which will accrue to such tract of land and whether the assessment made by the commissioners is correct, is not unconstitutional, as conferring judicial powers on a nonjudicial body, since such board does not exercise judicial powers within the meaning of the term as used in the clause in the Constitution prohibiting persons in one of the three departments of the state—legislative, executive, and judicial—from exercising any power belonging to the other departments. Owners of Lands v. People ex rel. Stookey, 113 Ill. 296.

Upon the trial of an appeal by the owner of land from an assessment levied thereon by drainage commissioners for benefits thereto by a proposed drainage, the jury may take into consideration the benefit the owner may derive by the drainage of a slough which separates him from other land belonging to him, as enabling him to cross at any point, and obviating the necessity of building and maintaining a bridge over the slough. Spear v. Drainage Comrs. 113 Ill. 632.

Under the Constitution and drainage laws of Illinois, the drainage commissioners of a drainage district cannot assess the lands situated therein for the cost of the proposed drainage, for a sum in excess of the benefits which such lands will receive thereby. Havana Twp. v. Kelsey, 120 Ill. 482, 11 N. E. 256.

To sustain an assessment for sewer purposes where the assessors are required to be disinterested freeholders, and to levy the assessment on the owners benefited in proportion, as nearly as may be, to the advantage deemed to accrue to each, it is essential that the proceedings show upon their face that the assessors possessed the requisite qualifications, and that their report show, not only that the assessment was made on the owners benefited, but in what proportion. State, Times, Prosecutor, v. Newark, 25 N. J. L. 399.

In determining whether or not a railroad right of way is benefited by the drainage in a drainage district, the jury have a right to take into consideration the fact that such drainage has the effect to reduce the volume of water in a natural water course so as to permit the company to maintain a smaller bridge and opening on its right of way across the same. District No. 3 Drainage Comrs. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 158 Ill. 353, 41 N. E. 1073.

Where a drainage law provides that a jury shall award and assess damages and benefits in favor of and against each tract of land in a drainage district separately, in the proportion in which such tract will be damaged or benefited, and shall in no case assess land in a greater amount than it will be benefited, or for more than its proportionate share of the estimated cost of the work,—it is indispensable, for the determination of these questions, that every fact materially affecting the extent and character of the work, and a reasonable estimate of the cost thereof, shall be before the jury. Badger v. Inlet Drainage Dist. 141 Ill. 540, 31 N. E. 170.

A law authorizing sewer commissioners to levy upon benefited estates a "proportional part of the cost thereof, not exceeding," etc., must be taken to mean proportional to the special benefit received. Hall v. Boston Street Comrs. 177 Mass. 434, 59 N. E. 68.

Lots within the city limits, near the compact part of the city, with houses around them, though not in their immediate vicinity, must, for purposes of sewer assessment, be regarded as city lots, and not as agricultural lands. Bishop v. Tripp, 15 R. I. 466, 8 Atl. 692.

The findings and report of the engineer under the drain statutes should, when adopted by the county board, be accepted as prima facie evidence of the benefits conferred upon each tract of land. Dodge County v. Acom, 61 Neb. 376, 85 N. W. 292.

The assessment of lots for the cost of a sewer according to the number of square feet in each lot, under a statute providing for the payment of the cost of sewers according to a front-foot rule, is a harmless error when the lots are all 60 L. R. A.

the same length. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Lindquist (Iowa) 93 N. W. 103.

An overestimate in the number of square feet in the estate of a person assessed for construction of a sewer does not invalidate the assessment if the estate was assessed no more than its just proportion of the expenses. Keith v. Boston, 120 Mass. 108.

In case a sewer constructed along several streets is a unity, the assessment may be made for the whole work under one proceeding. Grimmell v. Des Moines, 57 Iowa, 144, 10 N. W. 330.

Under the New York acts for the drainage of swamps, the acquisition of the title to the easement is not essential to the laying and confirmation of an assessment for the damages to be occasioned. Re Swan, 33 Hun, 200, Distinguishing People ex rel. Williams v. Haines, 49 N. Y. 587, on the ground that the latter case was under a special act which is more restrictive than the general law.

The fact that a portion of a sewer connecting with the main sewer had been constructed across land of defendant without condemning it does not relieve him from liability on the tax bill for the portion legally constructed. Miller v. Anheuser, 2 Mo. App. 168.

In a proceeding to assess the cost of a sewer improvement the court will not inquire into the methods which induced the municipality to make the improvement. Park Ecclesiastical Soc. v. Hartford, 47 Conn. 89.

Where a statute provides for assessments for sewers made in any "street," that term means public streets, either by lay-out or by dedication and acceptance. Bishop v. Tripp, 15 R. I. 466, 8 Atl. 692.

Irregularities in the mode of making assessments for drainage purposes, which can be interposed when the commissioners make the confirmation, will be waived by failure to interpose them at that time. Morrell v. Union Drainage Dist. No. 1, 118 Ill. 139, 8 N. E. 675.

A municipal corporation cannot assess the value of a sewer upon valuation of abutting property in its improved condition, but the assessment must be made on the basis of the value of the land independent of the buildings, which should be settled at the time the improvement is made. Boston v. Shaw, 1 Met. 130.

The invalidity of a provision of a city ordinance exempting persons paying a specified sum into the treasury from future assessments for the expense of constructing a sewer does not render void the assessments made against other property owners, where the amount of such assessments was not increased by such exemptions. Page v. St. Louis, 20 Mo. 136.

Other ordinances of a municipal corporation, providing for the construction of lateral branches to an out-fall sewer, may be introduced at the confirmation of assessments for the construction of such out-fall sewer under an ordinance providing for openings on both sides, for the purpose of showing good faith in the city in carrying out its provisions for lateral connections, so as to justify the assessment of property not abutting upon such lateral sewer. Gray v. Cicero, 177 Ill. 459, 53 N. E. 91.

In a proceeding under the law to establish a ditch, the opinion of witnesses acquainted with the property affected, as to its value with and without the ditch, is proper evidence, although they may not give an opinion as to the amount of the benefits or damages resulting to the land by the construction of the ditch. Yost v. Conroy, 92 Ind. 464, 41 Am. Rep. 156.

It is competent for farmers, being in the immediate neighborhood of low lands which it is proposed to drain, to give their opinions as to what extent, if any, such drainage would increase their value, in the trial of an appeal by the owner of such lands from the assessment levied thereon by the drainage commissioners. Spear v. Drainage Comrs. 113 Ill. 632.

In assessing a corner lot which abuts lengthwise on a sewer improvement, but fronts breadthwise on another street and not on the improvement, the lot should be deemed as fronting breadthwise on the improvement, and be assessed for the frontage it would have thereon in such case; and such rule is not affected by a statutory provision that the council may exempt from assessment such portion of the frontage of corner lots as to it may seem equitable. Cincinnati v. Honnigfort, 32 Ohio L. J. 32; Blanchard v. Columbus, 8 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 676.

A court will not interfere with the discretion of a city council, to which the matter has been delegated, in apportioning the assessment upon a corner lot in front and on the side of which sewers are constructed, where it is not shown that the discretion has been wantonly used or has been abused. Cincinnati v. Wewell, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 677.

4. Apportionment and equalization.

When part of an assessment for a sewer located in three towns has been properly apportioned to one of them, the fact that such portion has been improperly assessed and distributed among the individual landowners in such town does not affect the validity of the total assessment on the town, provided the town was benefited upon the entire tract within its limits. State, King, Prosecutor, v. Reed, 43 N. J. L. 186, Affirmed in 48 N. J. L. 370, 5 Atl. 178.

In determining the relative portions which the several towns for which a system of sewerage is established shall contribute to the cost of its construction, the value of the personal property in them may be taken into consideration. Re Kingman, 170 Mass. 111, 48 N. E. 1075.

Where a drainage work initiated in a higher municipality obtains an outlet in a lower municipality, the assessment for "outlet liability," provided for by statute, is limited to the cost of the work at such outlet. Sutherland-Innes Co. v. Romney Twp. 30 Can. S. C. 495.

An assessment on lands for the construction of a ditch, under a statute, cannot be enforced where the report of the appraisers of benefits and damages failed to show that they made a division of the costs of the construction of the ditch among the owners of the lands affected, as required by the statute. Bogart v. Castor, 87 Ind. 244.

After a sewer assessment apportioned equally between the city and the property benefited has been declared invalid, a second assessment, which imposes two thirds of the cost of improvement upon the property benefited, with a proviso that property owners who have paid the former assessment shall be exempt from further demand, constitutes an unlawful discrimination between the property of persons taxed, and cannot be sustained. White v. Saginaw, 67 Mich. 33, 34 N. W. 255.

In the absence of a statutory direction, a sewer assessment need not be apportioned throughout the taxing district by the common council authorizing the improvement; but they may properly devolve the duty upon one or more assessors. Warren v. Grand Haven, 30 Mich. 24.

Mere failure to provide for the apportioning of taxes according to the special benefits received, in a statute authorizing a city to provide for the construction of sewers and drains and to tax the cost thereof upon the lots or 60 L. R. A.

ground in the district in which the sewer is situated, does not render it unconstitutional and void, the city under such circumstances having the right to adopt any mode that is fair and legal. Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 156, 5 Pac. 781.

The omission of the assessors under a drainage act to certify that they made the assessments which they judged to be in proportion to the accruing benefits, will not invalidate the proceedings if such was the principle in fact governing their action. State, Britton, Prosecutor, v. Blake, 35 N. J. L. 208.

When the assessors of sewer expenses acted within the scope of their authority in adopting a uniform rule for assessing, the rule cannot be attacked in collateral proceedings, no matter how apparently inequitable the assessment may be in isolated cases. The assessment must stand or fall as a whole. Ithaca v. Babcock, 72 App. Div. 260, 76 N. Y. Supp. 49.

A sewer assessment required by charter to be levied upon property, the value of which is increased by the improvement, and which the resolution of the council directs to be assessed against the premises improved thereby, is void where the certificate attached to the assessment roll merely shows that the assessment was made pursuant to the resolution of the council, which may mean no more than in obedience to its command. Warren v. Grand Haven, 30 Mich. 24.

The tax roll of a sewer assessment required by charter to be assessed according to the benefits derived from the improvement must show expressly that the assessment was made on that basis; and it should also appear that the benefits to the whole property included in the taxing district will equal the whole cost of the proposed work. Adams v. Bay City, 78 Mich. 211, 44 N. W. 138.

A provision in a drainage law requiring the county court, after a drainage district has been formed and the commissioners have found the sum necessary to be raised by special assessment to perform the proposed drainage, to call a jury to apportion the tax according as the property may be severally benefited, does not make such law unconstitutional as violating a constitutional clause requiring the special assessments to be levied by the commissioners, or corporate authorities; since the jury have nothing to do with fixing the aggregate sum to be raised, and therefore cannot be said to levy the assessment. Huston v. Clark, 112 Ill. 345.

5. For what may be laid.

Benefited property is only liable for the actual expense of constructing the sewer. Re Fifth Ave. Sewer, 3 Pittsb. 278, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 364.

The cost of an entire system of sewerage including an outlet constructed outside the limits of a town, also a sum of money paid for a right of flowage through another sewer outside the limits, may all be assessed upon land within the town according to benefits received. Butler v. Montclair, 67 N. J. L. 426, 51 Atl. 494.

The mere fact that a charter provision authorizing the construction of a district sewer of dimensions larger than necessary for the drainage of the district so that other districts may drain into it, and compelling the district to pay the additional cost of such increased dimensions, is oppressive or unequal in its operation, does not render it void. Kansas City use of Adkins v. Richards, 34 Mo. App. 521.

An assessment on land in a reclamation district is not invalid because it includes a sum for the purpose of erecting a pump and maintaining it. Swamp Land Dist. No. 150 v. Silver, 98 Cal. 51, 32 Pac. 866.

A municipal corporation has no right to charge the cost of constructing flush tanks at the dead ends of a sewer to the fund collected by special assessments for the construction of such sewer, under an ordinance which does not provide for the construction of such flush tanks, although the same are necessarily beneficial for the perfect working of the system. People ex rel. McCornack v. McWethy, 177 Ill. 834, 52 N. E. 479.

An act authorizing and directing the trustees of a designated reclamation district to make up a sworn statement in detail of the total cost and incidental expenses of the work of reclamation therein, "based upon the books and vouchers thereof," and to "report" the same to the board of supervisors; whereupon such board must appoint commissioners to value and assess on the lands of the district "the whole amount so reported" in proportion to benefits resulting or to result therefrom,—is unconstitutional as an attempt by the legislature to levy an assessment upon the lands of the district,—the amount being the sum total shown by the books and vouchers, without reference to the nature or character of the charges in the books, calling for and admitting of no question as to the correctness of such books and vouchers or charges, and irrespective of any question as to whether the law authorizing and providing for the work has been complied with. People v. Houston, 54 Cal. 538.

Where a street has been paved at the expense of the abutting owner, and the pavement is torn up for the construction of a sewer, it cannot be repaved at the expense of the abutting owner, but must be restored by the city, and the expense must be accounted as part of the work of constructing the sewer. Burlington v. Palmer, 67 Iowa, 681, 25 N. W. 877.

An assessment levied by commissioners of a drainage district organized under the drainage laws of Illinois for the purpose of meeting an indebtedness created by such commissioners in advance is unauthorized and void. Winklemann v. Moredock & J. Landing Drainage Dist. 170 Ill. 37, 48 N. E. 715.

An assessment levied for the purpose of paying the outstanding liabilities of a drainage district without any definite information as to the amount, nature, and character of such liabilities is void as not coming within the limited purpose specified in the Constitution and drainage laws of Illinois, confining the levy of assessments in such districts to pay for the construction of levees, drains, and ditches, and for the repair of those already constructed. Ibid.

Under a power "to assess the cost and expense of constructing a sewer upon benefited property," the expenses of making the assessment cannot be included in the assessment, as the language of the Constitution is too uncertain to warrant an additional burden on private property. Harrisburg City v. Eby, 16 Pa. Co. Ct. 124.

But in Michigan it was held that a sewer assessment is not invalid because the warrant attached to the tax roll permits the collector to add 2 per cent for his fees. Warren v. Grand Haven, 30 Mich. 24.

The imposition of the cost of maintaining public sewers by special assessment upon property owners who have already been assessed for the cost of their construction, in case they make use of them, does not deprive them of property without due process of law, but is matter of public policy for the legislature, since they receive a special benefit from the construction of the sewer in the privilege of discharging their private sewers into it, even if they are not entitled to the free use of it. Carson v. Brock, 60 L. R. A.

ton Sewerage Comrs. 182 U. S. 398, 45 L. ed. 1151, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 860.

A municipality empowered to assess only for laying main sewers, not for maintaining or repairing them, the property served or benefited thereby, cannot levy an assessment on property upon the line of a sewer built by private persons and conveyed to it either for the expense of relaying it at a different grade to accommodate an extension, or of constructing the extension. Boyden v. Brattleboro, 65 Vt. 504, 27 Atl. 164.

6. Rights of property owner.

A number of the cases dealing with the rights of the property owner have been collected in preceding subdivisions, to which attention is directed. But a summary of the holdings may be made here in immediate connection with the question of the assessment. Curtesy and fair dealing entitle one who is to be charged with the expense of a drain to a voice in the determination of whether or not it shall be constructed. This right, however, is not usually secured by constitutional provisions, and in some instances to give the taxpayer anything like a veto power on the improvement proceeding might work serious injury to the public interests.

Assessments for local purposes, such as a drainage system, charged upon the property benefited in proportion to the benefit received, are not taxes within a county government act providing that no tax shall be levied upon any district until the proposition to levy the same has been submitted to the qualified electors. Holley v. Orange County, 106 Cal. 420, 39 Pac. 790.

Upon the question whether or not particular property shall be charged with the improvement, its owner should be entitled to a hearing if there is any doubt about the improvement being for his benefit. There certainly can be no power in the government to charge particular land with the expense of a drain which was entirely for the benefit of the public or of other private property while the taxing power is not subject to many of the constitutional restrictions, yet it must be exercised along well-established lines, so that the cost of an improvement which is for the benefit of the public must be borne by a general tax. The only justification for a local tax is that the particular improvement is for the benefit of a limited territory, and that with respect to such improvement such territory should be regarded as the public, and bear the cost. The taxpayer should also be accorded a hearing as to the validity and amount of the tax. The constitutional guaranty of due process of law has been invoked with reference to such assessments.

But due process of law in the enforcement of a drainage assessment exists if it can be enforced only by legal proceedings in which any defense going either to its validity or amount can be pleaded. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 589, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663.

Whenever by the laws of the state or by state authority a tax, assessment, servitude, or other burden is imposed upon property for public use, such as the drainage of swamp lands, and those laws provide for a method of confirming or contesting the charge thus imposed in the ordinary courts of justice with such notice to the person, or such proceedings with regard to the property, as is appropriate to the nature of the case, the judgment of such proceedings cannot be said to deprive the owner of such property without due process of law. Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 97, 24 L. ed. 618.

The owner of land in a drainage district, which has been officially assessed for benefits conferred thereto by such drainage, cannot be said to have been deprived of his property without due process of law where the drainage law under which such improvement is made affords ample opportunity of being heard upon every question of fact and law, and he fails to urge any just ground of defense, and suffers judgment to go against his land, to satisfy which it is about to be sold. Owners of Lands v. People ex rel. Stookey, 113 Ill. 296.

Statutes and ordinances authorizing the improvement usually safeguard the interests of the taxpayer against extravagance and other things which would add to the burdens upon the taxpayer, and he is entitled to the benefit of these safeguards, and the courts will see that he has them.

A statute limiting the amount of an assessment for any improvement to a certain percentage to the value of the lots or land applies to sewers. Conner v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio C. C. 336.

A statutory provision that in no case shall assessments for sewers exceed a specified amount per foot front is general in its nature, and applies whether the assessment be by the foot front or by benefits, or upon duplicate valuations. Toledo use of Gates v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 4 Ohio C. C. 113.

Making a statutory provision limiting assessments for sewers to one fourth the value of the property assessed applicable only in cities of a certain class does not render the statute obnoxious to a constitutional provision requiring all laws of a general nature to have uniform operation throughout the state. Cincinnati v. Connor, 55 Ohio St. 92, 44 N. E. 582.

An assessment for drain taxes, imposed under a statute requiring a description of the land benefited by the drains, is void where the lands are described as 10 acres of two government sub-divisions of 40 and 80 acres, without defining the positions of the 10-acre parcels. Atwell v. Zeluff, 26 Mich. 118.

The requirement of a statute that, upon the completion of a sewer a tax bill for the assessment against each piece of land be made out in the name of the owner, and that it be a lien upon the land described, is directory merely, and the lien is not invalidated by the fact that a name other than that of the owner is inserted by mistake. St. Louis use of Rotchford v. De Nove, 44 Mo. 136.

If a mistake in the description of land intended to be benefited by a drainage ditch is caused by the commissioner, it may be corrected and the assessment enforced where the land sought to be benefited is made clearly to appear. Luxadder v. State use of Rhine, 131 Ind. 598, 81 N. E. 453.

An erroneous description of lands upon which a sewer assessment is levied does not invalidate it where, by the city charter, the common council is authorized to correct errors in the description of lands on which an assessment is imposed. Hooker v. Rochester, 30 N. Y. Supp. 297.

A drainage assessment is a valid lien on land as against a collateral attack by the owner thereof, although such lands were described in the drainage proceedings as being owned by another party in whose name the land appeared on the tax duplicate, under a statute making it sufficient notice if lands affected are described as belonging to the person who appears to be the owner according to the last tax duplicate, or record of transfers. Reed v. Kalfsbeck, 147 Ind. 148, 45 N. E. 476, 46 N. E. 466.

By virtue of the act of February 19, 1895, § 2, when the benefit to property accruing from GO L. R. A.

the construction of a trunk sewer is prospective only, depending upon the construction and connection of another sewer, not yet built, the assessment is to be made at the time of the construction of the trunk sewer; but the lien of such assessment does not come into existence until the connecting sewer is built, and interest thereon does not begin to run until the confirmation of the assessment for the connecting sewer. Seaman v. Camden, 66 N. J. L. 516, 49 Atl. 877.

The right of a municipal corporation to levy a special assessment for the construction of a sewer cannot be questioned on the ground that the ordinance providing for its construction was passed before the necessary steps had been taken to acquire the right of way therefor over private property beyond the corporate limits. The necessary steps to condemn or otherwise acquire such right of way may be taken after the assessment of benefits has been made and confirmed. Maywood Co. v. Maywood, 140 Ill. 216, 29 N. E. 704.

But a municipal corporation authorized to construct sewers and assess the lots where "the work is to be done" cannot first construct the sewer and then collect the assessments. Harper's Appeal, 109 Pa. 9, 1 Atl. 791.

The mere passage of a prior ordinance for the construction of other sewers which would effectually drain certain lots does not make such lots "already provided with drainage," within the meaning of a statutory exemption from assessment for sewers of lots so provided, where the prior ordinance was never carried into execution, although still unrepealed. Cincinnati v. Bickett, 28 Ohio St. 49.

Where a sewer has been made through an alley in the rear of a lot, on which there is but one improvement, already supplied with drainage by the sewer previously made in the street in front, such lot cannot be assessed for the alley sewer, unless there is actual drainage into it. Cincinnati v. Wewell, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 677.

Jury.

It is generally held that the taxpayer is not entitled to have the amount of his assessment fixed by a jury. Such proceedings are not within the class of cases for which the Constitution provides a jury trial.

Sewer assessments, like other assessments for benefits, are a kind of tax, and as such subject to the revision of a court, not of a jury, and a statute providing for such assessments is not unconstitutional under B. I. Const. art. 1, § 15, which declares that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate. Bishop v. Tripp, 15 E. I. 466, 8 Atl. 692, 16 R. I. 198, 14 Atl. 79.

An act requiring the board of county commissioners to ascertain the aggregate cost of a drainage ditch and apportion the same to land according to benefit received, is not invalid on the ground that it fails to provide for an impartial tribunal to determine the benefits and make the assessments. State ex rel. Latimer v. Henry, 28 Wash. 38, 68 Pac. 368.

The drainage law authorizing the court to order a special assessment to be made by the commissioners of a drainage district in lieu of a jury does not conflict with any provisions of the Illinois Constitution. The right of a trial by jury, guaranteed by the Constitution, has no bearing on a question of this character. Nor is an assessment of this character a taking or damaging of property within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution prohibiting the taking or damaging of private property for public use without just compensation. Briggs v. Union Drainage Dist. No. 1, 140 Ill. 53, 29 N. E. 721.

Even the issues formed in an action to enforce by foreclosure the lien of an assessment on lands for the construction of a ditch, being in the nature of an equitable suit, are triable by the court, and not by a jury. Laverty v. State ex rel. 1111, 109 Ind. 217, 9 N. E. 774.

But the owner of land, on appeal to the county court from an assessment by commissioners of a drainage district under a clause in the drainage act allowing such appeal upon the sole ground that such tax is a greater amount than the benefits to accrue to the land by the proposed drainage, is entitled to a jury if he demands one, such act evidently embracing a jury trial; and the issue, being one of fact as to whether or not the land is benefited, and, if so, the amount, is one properly within the province of a jury. Mascall v. Drainage Dist. 122 Ill. 620, 14 N. E. 47.

One not denied a jury, and whose personal property was not distrained, cannot question the constitutionality of a drainage act because it provides for issues of fact to be tried by the court without a jury, and authorizes the commissioners of drainage to sell personal property for the payment of any assessment of benefits for the construction of a ditch, the same as a county treasurer is empowered to do. Scott v. Brackett, 89 Ind. 413.

7. Other matters.

An assessment is not invalid because a taxing district or assessing district was not established, where the assessment is for the construction of a trunk sewer, under a statute providing that the construction of main or trunk sewers may be provided for without regard to districts. Wilson v. Cincinnati, 5 Ohio N. P. 68.

An assessment for a sewer constructed in parts of two districts is not invalid under the Ohio statutes, providing for the division of municipal corporations into sewer districts, and that where a corporation is so divided the assessment provided for by statute shall be by districts, as such provisions are not jurisdictional in character. Cincinnati v. Honnigfort, 32 Ohio L. J. 32.

A tax bill whereby the cost of constructing a district sewer is assessed against the property in the district is not rendered invalid by reason of the fact that the sewer was constructed in the center of a street forming the dividing line between that and another district, thereby placing one half of the width of the pipe in the other district, coupled with the further fact that the surface water of the side of the street located outside the district was drained into it through inlets constructed for that purpose. St. Joseph ex rel. Danaher v. Dillon, 61 Mo. App. 317.

The mere fact that water mains of city water-works have not been extended along a street in which a sewer has been constructed will not defeat an assessment on the contiguous property for the cost of the sewer, where the same can be used without the city water for all purposes of drainage except for water-closet purposes. Walker v. Aurora, 140 Ill. 402, 29 N. E. 741.

An assessment cannot be made for the construction of drains which are laid across private property without right so that the act constitutes a trespass. Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232, affirming 17 Hun, 561; Re Rhinelander, 68 N. Y. 105.

In case the original assessment of benefits in a drainage proceeding proves inadequate to complete the work, the court may, upon due petition and notice, reassess benefits in order to complete the work or pay a deficit in case it has been completed, under a statute making the power of the court subject to the limitations 60 L. R. A.

that the entire cost of the improvement must fall upon the lands benefited, and that no tract can be assessed in a sum exceeding the amount of benefits resulting to it from the ditch, but otherwise giving it large discretion in respect to modifying, equalizing, and changing assessments. Rogers v. Voorhees, 124 Ind. 460, 24 N. E. 374.

But a statute authorizing a reassessment for the expense of constructing a sewer in all cases where, by reason of a defect in the ordinance under which the improvement was made, the special tax bills issued therefor remain unpaid, violates the constitutional provision prohibiting retrospective legislation so far as it applies to assessments for improvements made prior to its adoption, and cannot be defended upon the ground that it constitutes an exercise of the power of the legislature to authorize the levying of taxes to pay pre-existing taxes, as such power is limited to general taxation, and does not include assessments for local purposes. St. Louis v. Clements, 52 Mo. 133.

Irregularities in a sewer assessment are cured by the city council's setting the assessment wholly aside, and making a reassessment in accordance with the provisions of the charter. Townsend v. Manistee, 88 Mich. 408, 50 N. W. 321.

Every owner of land in a drainage district has an interest in the classification of such land, which interest is recognized by the drainage laws in giving such owners the right to notice of the time when and the place where the commissioners will meet to hear objections thereto, and in giving them the right to appeal from the decision of such commissioners; and, in making assessments, the commissioners must have regard to such classification, and have no power, on the ground that it will not be benefited thereby, to credit certain land with the full amount levied against it, thus in effect releasing it from any assessment; and a levy so made will render the whole assessment void. People ex rel. Davidson v. Cole, 128 Ill. 158, 21 N. E. 6.

Drainage commissioners have no power to incur any indebtedness against a drainage district organized under the drainage laws of Illinois of the assessment levied, although such assessment was wholly inadequate to complete the work commenced, and the additional work was necessary to protect the lands of the district, and the commissioners advanced the money for the excess; and a special assessment levied to meet such indebtedness is void. Ahrens v. Minnie Creek Drainage Dist. 170 Ill. 262, 48 N. E. 971; Winkelmann v. Moredock & I. Landing Drainage Dist. 170 Ill. 37, 48 N. E. 715.

A law making benefited property liable for sewer assessments if made within two years from its completion is no more unreasonable or contrary to any principle of constitutional right than is a statute of limitations. Hall v. Boston Street Comrs. 177 Mass. 434, 59 N. E. 68.

Proceedings imposing on land the work of constructing and repairing a ditch create on the land a permanent charge in the nature of a servitude. McCann v. Hinchinbrocke Twp. Rap. Jud. Quebec, 8 B. R. 149.

8. Lien.

A lien for the proportional cost of a sewer along a street cannot be filed against owners of abutting property without statutory authorisation. Meadville v. Dickson, 129 Pa. 1, 18 Atl. 513; Mauch Chunk v. Shorts, 61 Pa. 389.

The right of a municipal corporation to enter liens against lots through or along which a sewer runs for any part of the cost of construction is a power of special taxation, and must have explicit legislation to support it. Philadelphia v. Tryon, 35 Pa. 401.

Under the statutes relating to the construction of sewers in New York city, no assessment can be made which will create a lien or encumbrance upon property of the city. Dowdney v. New York, 54 N. Y. 186.

Where a drain assessment shall be and remain a lien on the benefited lands until fully paid, it is a lien encumbrance, due and payable at the time it is made, although the landowner may for his own benefit, as a privilege, pay the same by instalments. Clapp v. Minnesota Grass Twine Co. 81 Minn. 511, 84 N. W. 344.

Ditch taxes declared by statute to be a perpetual lien upon the lands assessed until discharged become a lien as soon as they become a charge on the land by the assessment of benefits made by the drain commissioner. A mere delay of the drain commissioner to present the assessment roll to the supervisors, or of the supervisors in extending it upon the tax roll, does not invalidate the lien. Lindsay v. Eastwood, 72 Mich. 336, 40 N. W. 455.

Equity will enforce a lien on property liable under a statute authorizing a drainage of swamp lands, and charging the expense thereof on the lands benefited. Williams v. Allen, 32 N. J. Eq. 485.

The lien of an assessment on land for the construction of a ditch is lost, and may be set aside as a cloud on the title, by a sale of the land under foreclosure of a mortgage existing prior to the institution of the drainage proceedings, although a deed was not acquired thereunder until after the drainage lien attached, as the latter is subordinate to the lien of the mortgage, and the mortgagee is not estopped to assert his priority by silently standing by and permitting the drain to be constructed, such conduct being entirely consistent with a reliance upon such priority. Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700.

The provision in the drainage laws of Illinois authorizing the foreclosure of the lien of special assessments levied on lands by drainage commissioners of the drainage district in which such lands lie, and providing a special proceeding for such foreclosure, not conforming to that provided by the general revenue laws for the foreclosure of liens for taxes, is not unconstitutional, as an amendment to the Constitution confers upon the general assembly all necessary power in matters of drainage, both as to the mode of levying and of collecting special assessments upon property benefited and lying within a drainage district; and that amendment, so far as it invades the former limitations of the Constitution, must prevail; and such limitations are not applicable to the subject-matter of special assessments for drainage. Samuels v. Drainage Comrs. 125 Ill. 536, 17 N. E. 829.

The statutory lien of an assessment upon the easement of a turnpike company in its roadway for benefits conferred by the construction of a ditch may be enforced by a decree of foreclosure and sale. Indianapolis & C. Gravel Road Co. v. State ex rel. Flack, 105 Ind. 37, 4 N. E. 316.

The right of way and track of a railroad company lying within a drainage district may be sold under a decree foreclosing the lien of a special assessment levied thereon by such district for benefits conferred by the proposed drainage. Wabash Eastern R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 384, 10 L. R. A. 285, 25 N. E. 781.

But this cannot be done in the absence of express statutory authority so to do. Louisville, 60 L. R. A.

N. A. & C. R. Co. v. State use of Beckman, 122 Ind. 443, 24 N. E. 350.

A township drain tax is by statute made a lien upon the land against which it is assessed, and, if legal, creates a cloud upon the title of the owner, who may maintain a bill in equity to remove it by having the assessment declared void. Frost v. Leatherman, 55 Mich. 83, 20 N. W. 705.

A drainage assessment cannot be made a lien on real estate superior to that of an existing mortgage without giving the mortgagee his day in court. Pierce v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 131 Ind. 284, 31 N. E. 48.

The lien of a drainage assessment levied for the construction of a public ditch is junior to the lien of a pre-existing mortgage, where the drainage law simply provides that the assessment shall "be a lien from the date of filing the report of the commissioners," without other provision indicating an intention to make such lien paramount to prior encumbrances. State ex rel. Ely v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144.

The lien of a ditch assessment is not extinguished by the foreclosure of a paramount lien for state taxes, where the ditch assessment was a lien before the foreclosure action was executed, and no effort was made to foreclose as against it, and the parties to the ditch proceedings were not made parties thereto. McCollum v. Uhl, 128 Ind. 304, 27 N. E. 152, 725.

A statute which annuls all judgments for the drainage of lands, all liens for assessment for drainage, and excludes certain lands from the limits of the drainage district, and exempts them from all future drainage assessments, is unconstitutional, where vested rights are thereby divested, and the obligation of contracts impaired. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. New Orleans, 30 La. Ann. 1371.

9. Enforcement.

In ordering works of drainage, the state exercises its sovereign power, and may direct the collection of the assessment therefor before the drainage is completed. Re First Drainage Dist. 27 La. Ann. 20.

An assessment on lands for benefits conferred by the construction of a drain in pursuance of a statute is not a contract in which the one constructing the drain has a vested right, but is purely a statutory right or remedy against common right; and its enforcement must be in strict conformity with the requirements of the statute in force at that time. Bate v. Sheets, 64 Ind. 209.

Sewer assessments must be collected by proceedings in rem against the property, and not by an action of assumpsit. Philadelphia v. Bradfield, 159 Pa. 517, 28 Atl. 360.

Where the statutes provide for the collection of sewer assessments by sale in the same manner as is provided for collection of delinquent taxes, an action cannot be maintained against the landowner for the amount. Roxbury v. Nickerson, 114 Mass. 544.

An averment in a complaint to enforce a ditch assessment upon lands, that the owner did not appeal from the assessment; that he stood by and saw the work done without objection; that the course of the ditch through his premises was changed at his instance; that a certain amount was expended for his benefit in constructing the ditch through his land; and that he did not question the legality of the assessment until after the work was completed, without alleging that he either requested the work to be done or promised to pay for it,—will not render him liable in assumpsit for the value of the labor done in constructing the ditch through his premises if the assessment lien to enforce which the action is brought fails because of defective description of the property. Boatman v. Macy, 82 Ind. 490.

But a landowner is liable in assumpsit for the value of work and labor performed in constructing a ditch over his land irrespective of whether the proceedings instituted to establish the same, in pursuance of a statute, by which he was assessed for the benefits conferred upon his land, were or were not valid, where he had with others signed a written waiver of all error, informality, or omission in the proceedings, and had stood by from day to day and seen the work being done, encouraged its completion, and promised to pay what the work would be worth. Flora v. Cline, 89 Ind. 208.

And when a statute authorizing a sewer improvement provides the municipal corporation with a lien on the benefited property, and does not clearly prohibit a common-law action in personam, the debt is not discharged by the expiration of time within which the lien could have been filed, and may be recovered in assumpsit. Scranton v. Smith, 6 Lack. Legal News, 185.

To enforce an assessment upon abutting property under a statute permitting the construction of trunk sewers under certain prescribed proceedings, and the assessment of private property therefor, it must be shown that the sewer was in fact a trunk sewer. Cincinnati use of Deters v. McDuffie, 1 Ohio N. P. 53.

A sewer assessment upon benefited property cannot be collected as a debt by a common-law action, unless such remedy is given by statute, as it constitutes a tax. McKeesport v. Fidler, 147 Pa. 532, 23 Atl. 799.

A ditching association may recover a personal judgment against a landowner for the amount of a lien which it had against his lands for the assessment of benefits conferred by the construction of a drain, but which it did not enforce, but waived the right thereto upon the faith of his promise to pay the same upon demand if suit to enforce the lien was not brought. Hull v. Brearley Run Draining Asso. 58 Ind. 520.

A personal judgment may be recovered against a railroad company to enforce the collection of a sewer assessment under a statute making such assessment a lien and authorizing its foreclosure, the right of way and franchises of which is not subject to sale upon execution and decree for the enforcement of such lien. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Bowker, 9 Ind. App. 428, 36 N. E. 864.

This is under the power of the courts to provide a remedy for an existing right, since the ordinary method of collecting by sale of the property benefited is prohibited by considerations of public policy. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. State, 8 Ind. App. 377, 35 N. E. 916.

In a proceeding for judgment against the right of way of a railroad company within a drainage district for an assessment by the drainage commissioners, it is for the jury to say whether the right of way was benefited by the carrying off of water that at times stood thereon in ponds and holes. District No. 8 Drainage Comrs. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 158 Ill. 353, 41 N. E. 1073.

In an action by a draining association to recover an assessment for benefit to land by drainage, it is not necessary that the completion of the drain should be averred, as such completion is not a condition precedent to the right to collect assessments. Rel River Draining Asso. v. Topp, 16 Ind. 242.

A statutory requirement that assessments imposed upon reclaimed swamp land be collected in gold coin does not impair the obligation of 60 L. R. A.

any contract. Reclamation Dist. No. 108 v. Hagar, 6 Sawy. 567, 4 Fed. 366.

Where, under a statute authorizing county commissioners to make contracts for the drainage of land and assess the expense upon the property benefited, contracts are made and the work done, but it proves to be of no benefit to any property, and no assessments can be made, the contractors may recover against the petitioners who instituted the drainage proceedings, but not against the commissioners of the non-petitioning landowners. Moore v. Barry, 30 S. C. 530, 4 L. R. A. 294, 9 S. E. 589.

Under the provision of the Michigan drain law of 1885, that drain taxes shall be collected in the same manner as state and other general taxes, land returned delinquent for the drain taxes may be bid off in the name of the state, for the use of the state, county, and town in proportion to the tax due each as specified in the general tax law, although, because drain taxes are neighborhood affairs, neither the state, county, nor town has any interest in the moneys arising from such sales. Hilton v. Dumphey, 113 Mich. 241, 71 N. W. 527.

A tender before suit brought of a sewer assessment and interest, without a tender of a penalty prescribed by a statute providing that special assessments shall be payable by the owners of the property assessed, personally, by the time stipulated, in the ordinance, and that, if payment is not made by the time stipulated, the amount assessed, together with interest and the penalty, may be recovered by suit,—is insufficient to bar an action for such assessment with interest and the penalty, as the right thereto accrues on failure to pay at the time stipulated, such penalty not being prescribed as compensation for services in collecting the assessment. Toledo use of Gates v. Platt, 2 Ohio N. P. 304.

A purchaser at a sale to collect a drainage assessment, of land which is erroneously described, is subrogated to the rights of the one who did the work, so that the assessment may be enforced against the land benefited in the hands of the original owner, but not in the hands of his assignee without notice. Klinger v. Lemier, 135 Ind. 77, 34 N. E. 698.

Payment of a sewer assessment afterwards set aside, but not refunded, operates as satisfaction of a new assessment. Bayonne v. Morris, 61 N. J. L. 127, 38 Atl. 819.

An action to collect a drainage assessment levied under a drainage law which provides that the action may be brought in any court of competent jurisdiction must be commenced in the courts of the county in which the real estate assessed is situated, although the owner may reside in another county in which the drainage proceedings were instituted, under the general law requiring actions for the recovery of real estate, or of an estate or interest therein, or to determine such right or interest and for injuries to real property, to be brought in the county where the land is located. Dowden v. State use of Bull, 106 Ind. 157, 6 N. E. 136.

Where the route of a sewer as established by ordinance runs through private property which has not been condemned, a contract entered into between the owner and the city officers in charge of the work, by which, in consideration of the grant of the right of way, the owner's time in which to pay his assessment is extended three years, is valid; and the city, having availed itself of the benefit of the contract, will be presumed to have ratified it. St. Louis use of Lancaster v. Armstrong, 56 Mo. 298.

And such contract is binding on the contractor, so as to prevent his instituting an action on the tax bill before the expiration of the time agreed upon, as, without such agreement, the construction of the sewer would have been illegal. Ibid.

After a lawful order of assessment of the cost of a sewer has been passed and has taken effect, a warrant for its execution has been committed to the city treasurer, and notice been given to the owners of the estates assessed, it is not within the power of the municipal authorities to rescind the entire order laying the assessment. Woodbridge v. Cambridge, 114 Mass. 486.

A judgment recovered for a drainage tax will not be enforced, for the reason that the consideration thereof has failed, where the work which has been abandoned has been a detriment rather than a benefit to the lands, which remain under water,—a place of resort for water fowl, hunting and fishing. Davidson v. New Orleans, 84 La. Ann. 170.

c. Collection and distribution of fund.

An owner whose property has been assessed for the construction of a sewer has a right to have the city keep an account showing what moneys have been expended by it for the improvement within the power conferred upon it by law for making the same. People ex rel. McCornack v. McWethy, 177 Ill. 334, 52 N. E. 479.

A statute authorizing the construction of a sewer and the assessment of adjoining property is not unconstitutional on the ground that the assessments may bring in more money than is required for the construction of the sewer, as the sewer can be made sufficiently expensive to exhaust the assessments. But it seems that, though such a statute is not unconstitutional, the proceeds of the assessment must either be wholly expended on the sewer, or, if not so expended, the surplus must be held by the city ratable for the abutters, and cannot be diverted to any purpose for which the city had no authority to raise it. Cleveland v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 50.

Where, by statute, in case a greater amount is assessed for a sewer than is required for the work, it is to be apportioned and paid to the owners of the property assessed, a property owner must look to the municipal corporation, and cannot bring an action against the sewer commissioners to restrain the payment of the moneys collected. Lutes v. Briggs, 64 N. Y. 404.

It is within the power of the court to stay the further collection of an assessment for the construction of a sewer by a municipal corporation by refusing judgment for more than is necessary to meet the final cost thereof, where such cost has been fully and finally determined. People ex rel. McCornack v. McWethy, 177 Ill. 334, 52 N. E. 479.

A statute authorizing the expenditure of drainage funds collected on assessments in excess of what was necessary to complete the ditch, for new work on the ditch, does not authorize the collection of that portion of the assessment not needed and never called for to complete the original construction. Reamer v. Hogg, 142 Ind. 138, 41 N. E. 353.

In a suit for a municipal sewer assessment, the defendant cannot show that the cost of the improvement was less than the assessments, when the assessments were made in compliance with law. Philadelphia v. Coates, 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 418.

In a proceeding by a municipal corporation to reimburse itself for the amount of bonds which it has issued for the construction of a sewer improvement partly through its territory under direction of sewer commissioners, damages due a taxpayer for land taken for the improvement cannot be set off, where the only thing that the municipal corporation is permitted by the statute to pay over to the commissioners in liquidation of the assessment against it, which is represented by the bond, is money and improvement certificates issued for construction of the work. State ex rel. Hoboken Land & Improv. Co. v. Marvin, 51 N. J. L. 296, 17 Atl. 158.

Under the New York act of 1867, money paid to a county treasurer under a drainage assessment belongs to the drainage commissioners, and not to the county; so that, in case the assessment is set aside, the county will not be liable to refund the money. Dewey v. Niagara County, 62 N. Y. 294, Reversing 2 Hun, 392.

A township is not liable for drain taxes legally imposed and paid to its treasurer under protest, where, by statute, they do not form part of the township moneys, but remain a separate fund for the payment of orders specifically drawn upon it. Dawson v. Aurelius Twp. 49 Mich. 479, 18 N. W. 824; Camp v. Algansee Twp. 50 Mich. 4, 14 N. W. 672.

Drainage commissioners are authorized, under the Illinois drainage laws, to raise money by special assessments on the lands in their district, to be expended, under the direction and approval of the county court, outside the district, where such expenditure is necessary for the protection or the complete drainage of the lands within the district; and a petition to the court for leave to raise the money need not state where the same is to be expended. Hosmer v. Hunt Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 360, 26 N. E. 584.

d. Curing defects.

The legislature has the right to decide that ditches dug in good faith under proceedings which are void because not in compliance with the statute are a public benefit and shall be saved to the public; or the decision may be delegated to the county commissioners. Curran v. Shelby County, 56 Minn. 432, 57 N. W. 1070.

The legislature has the power to authorize the payment of expenses incurred in the construction of a drainage ditch, under an act which was declared unconstitutional after such expenditures were made. Lewis County v. Gordon, 20 Wash. 80, 54 Pac. 779.

A statute authorizing the levy of sewer assessments for a work already constructed, but not paid for because of a previous authority therefor being declared void, is not an attempt to exercise judicial functions. Hall v. Boston Street Comrs. 177 Mass. 434, 50 N. E. 68.

A law may authorize a municipal corporation to levy special assessments for sewers already built, and the point cannot be decided otherwise by the false analogy of executed consideration in contracts, since the benefit and payment both are compulsory, not matters of contract, and a betterment already executed when the law authorizing the tax was passed will sustain the tax, as well as a work executed with express notice that it is under the law, as payment for such improvement must be made. Ibid.

Defects in proceedings for the construction of a sewer may be corrected by subsequent legislation, so as to uphold an assessment against property owners, where the defects were, that the ordinance was not introduced as required by the municipal charter, that the records of the proceedings were imperfect, that the map and assessments did not remain on file the required time, and that proper notice of the proceedings was not given; since those formalities might have been dispensed with in the first instance, and therefore there is nothing to prevent their absence from being cured. State ex rel. Walter v. Union, 33 N. J. L. 350.

When drainage commissioners advance funds for an improvement, and thereby acquire a concessionable, if not legal, right to repayment, equity will recognize their right to be subrogated, and will enforce an assessment therefor on the benefited premises. Allen v. Williams, 33 N. J. Eq. 584.

Although the statute under which a sewer is built is special and unconstitutional, the reception of the benefits is a sufficient basis for imposition of a corresponding burden, when the legislature provides the proper agency and rule for assessing the same. Brown v. Union, 65 N. J. L. 601, 48 Atl. 562.

The legislature may provide for the completion of a partly finished drain, and point out a way for the correction of errors so as to make it possible to complete it, although the expense is increased thereby. This increased expense, although due to the mistakes of the commissioner, must be paid by those benefited by the drain as a part of its cost. Antekell v. Hayward, 119 Mich. 525, 78 N. W. 557.

Where an ordinance adopted under a statute providing that sewers shall be of such dimensions as may be prescribed by ordinance, and may be changed, enlarged, or extended, is invalid by reason of the fact that it delegated to a city officer the duty of determining the dimensions of the sewer, the adoption of a proper ordinance during the progress of the work commenced under the original ordinance cures the defect, and an assessment for the expense of the improvement is valid. St. Louis use of Fox v. Schoenemann, 52 Mo. 348.

Where a tax bill issued for the cost of constructing a sewer was declared invalid because the cost had not been apportioned by the board of public works, the board may subsequently apportion the cost, and the new tax bill is not rendered invalid by such delay. Dollar Sav. Bank v. Ridge, 79 Mo. App. 26.

Where a statute authorizes the construction of sewers only in public streets, an assessment made for a sewer constructed in a private way cannot be validated by the subsequent lay-out of the street as a public street, although the assessment was made after such lay-out. Bishop v. Tripp, 15 R. I. 466, 8 Atl. 692.

A statute providing for sewer assessments for a whole city, passed after the sewer has been constructed, is not unconstitutional under R. I. Const., which does not inhibit retrospective legislation simply because it is retrospective. Cleveland v. Tripp, 13 R. I. 50.

In a proceeding by a drainage commissioner in a court of general jurisdiction to enforce a drainage assessment of which the property owner is entitled to notice and an opportunity to litigate all proper questions, the court may reform a description of the property assessed so as to make the lien effectual, since the property actually benefited should bear its proportion of the expense of constructing a drain, and the court should reform mistakes so that the assessment can be enforced. State ex rel. Ely v. Smith, 124 Ind. 302, 24 N. E. 331.

A re-classification of the lands in a drainage district correcting the errors of a former classification, and making land assessable that before was not assessed for benefits conferred, renders such land liable, not only for future assessments, but for the payment of bonds and interest issued on the strength of an assessment levied before such land was assessed, and the statute authorizing such re-classification and levy is not unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of any contract, since the owner of the land acquired no rights under the first assessment of benefits,—he simply enjoyed the benefit of a mistake, which such statute afforded the means of correcting. Boul v. People ex rel. Baker, 127 Ill. 240, 20 N. E. 1.

Under statutory provisions empowering a city to cause estimates of the expense of constructing sewers to be made, and to levy assessments therefor upon the property benefited, and, in case the cost of the proposed work exceeds the assessment, authorizing a further levy, the sewer assessment is valid although made for the first time after the building of the work, where the subsequent section provides that, if the city deems it necessary for the more speedy execution of its ordinances, it may cause necessary works to be executed at its own expense on account of the person assessable therefor. Wetmore v. Campbell, 2 Sandf. 341; Lainbeer v. New York, 4 Sandf. 109.

An injunction restraining the collection of a tax for a drainage ditch because the commissioners had not obtained title to the easement will not prevent new proceedings to condemn such easement under curative acts of the legislature. Curran v. Sibley County, 56 Minn. 432, 57 N. W. 1070.

X. Contesting assessment.

a. Who may contest.

A bill to set aside an illegal drain tax may be maintained by one upon whose land it is a lien, and upon whose title it casts a cloud. Alger v. Slaght, 64 Mich. 589, 31 N. W. 581.

One owning a large section of land to be assessed for a drainage improvement is sufficiently interested, even before the assessment is made, to enable him to maintain an action to prevent unnecessary expense. Woodruff v. Fisher, 17 Barb. 224.

A taxpayer of a municipal corporation who has no property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction of a sewer, cannot file exceptions to the report of viewers appointed to assess damages and benefits resulting therefrom. Olyphant Borough Sewer, 198 Pa. 534, 48 Atl. 487.

Record title to land is not necessary to entitle parties having an actual interest therein to come in and defend in a proceeding to establish a drain affecting such land. Beil v. Cox, 122 Ind. 153, 23 N. E. 705.

None but owners of the property assessed are entitled to maintain a proceeding to vacate a sewer assessment under the New York statutes. Williamson v. New York, 3 Hun. 65.

The husband of the owner of land in a drainage district is not made a party to the record of the proceeding of drainage commissioners of such district, or shown to be the owner of or interested in such land, so as to entitle him to maintain a writ of certiorari against such commissioners, from the mere fact that at one time the commissioners attempted to settle with him the damages to such land by the location of a district ditch thereon. Scheiwe v. Holz, 168 Ill. 432, 48 N. E. 65.

A property owner whose lands are not traversed by a proposed drain, but who is within the assessment district, is not entitled to be heard upon the question of the public necessity for the drain, where by statute the determination of the drain commissioner is conclusive except in condemnation proceedings. Roberts v. Smith, 115 Mich. 5, 72 N. W. 1001.

A property owner whose land will be injured by the construction of a ditch has the right to appear in the proceedings to establish it and file a remonstrance, although his land is not described in the petition, and no damages are assessed in his favor or benefits against his land, where the statute provides that "any owner of lands affected by the work proposed" may remonstrate, although, in enumerating the causes for a remonstrance, the question of benefits and damages appears to be restricted to persons affected. Reasoner v. Creek, 101 Ind. 482.

Different landowners may join in objections to a tax where their objections are identical, and there is nothing to show that confusion or embarrassment will be produced thereby. People ex rel. Funk v. Keener, 194 Ill. 16, 61 N. E. 1060.

Owners of property may join in a suit to enjoin the collection of an assessment for the construction of a sewer on the ground of an arbitrary levy thereof and failure of the charter to provide for notice, although their interests are distinct and affected to a different extent, as the cause of injury is common to all, and gives them sufficient community of interests for that purpose; but owners claiming that no benefits result to their lands from the improvement cannot join, as in such case the assessment and attempted enforcement are several in their nature as respects each owner. Paulson v. Portland, 16 Or. 450, 1 L. R. A. 673, 19 Pac. 450.

But in Jones v. Cardwell, 98 Ind. 331, it was held that a joint action cannot be maintained by separate property owners to enjoin the collection of a drainage assessment against their property, since the rights respect separate and definite parcels of land, and the causes of action are, therefore, separate and distinct and held in separate rights.

A court of equity will not enjoin the collection of an assessment on lands for the construction of a sewer and the diversion of a natural water course therein, in a joint action by several landowners, on the ground that the assessment is void because the statute conferring upon the city the power to regulate or change within its limits the course of natural streams, to construct sewers and assess the cost upon the parties specially benefited, is unconstitutional in so far as it undertakes to give the power of taking private property without providing any mode of ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid the owners; also because certain conditions precedent, prescribed by city ordinances, which must be observed to make the assessment legal, were not complied with; since such an assessment is void by reason of its inherent defects, and creates no lawful lien, and casts no cloud upon titles, so that an adequate remedy is afforded at law, nor will equity interpose merely to afford a consolidation of actions, or to save the expense of separate actions, as a multiplicity does not mean a multitude of suits. Murphy v. Wilmington, 6 Houst. (Del.) 108.

A landowner who neither pays a drain tax under protest, nor seeks to avoid it by timely application to appellate proceedings, must make out very strong equities of a substantial character where he waits until the drain taxes have become a charge and offered for sale against his lands before filing his bill to set them aside. Barker v. Vernon Twp. 63 Mich. 516, 30 N. W. 175.

b. Method of contesting.

When a method of contesting a sewer assessment is provided by the statute by means of a review in the proceeding itself, that method should always be followed, because the defect must be very serious which will induce a court to entertain it on a collateral attack.

Resort to an independent action to set aside a drainage award is not proper where the statute provides for appeal to a statutory administrative board of the state, which has full authority in the matter so long as such appeal has not been taken. People v. Wasson, 64 N. Y. 167.

Where a statute providing for drainage assessments provides an adequate remedy in case of an erroneous assessment, that remedy is exclusive, and parties who neglect to pursue it will be conclusively presumed to be contented with the assessment. Wabash Eastern R. Co. v. East Lake Fork Special Drainage Dist. 134 Ill. 384, 10 L. R. A. 285, 25 N. E. 781.

The remedy for a sewer assessment objected to on the ground of no benefit received is not by injunction to restrain its collection, but by appeal to the district court. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Lindquist (Iowa) 93 N. W. 108.

The rule that persons affected by a drainage assessment must seek relief therefrom by some direct proceeding, or by an appeal, and cannot attack the same collaterally, applies to infants. Harris v. Ross, 112 Ind. 314, 13 N. E. 873.

When a sewer assessment levied by lawful authority is sought to be attacked collaterally, every proper presumption must prevail in support of a judicial determination. Ithaca v. Babcock, 72 App. Div. 260, 76 N. Y. Supp. 49.

One who did not avail himself of the statutory steps to contest the legality of a drain by which he is not damaged, and for which his assessment is small, is not entitled, upon the application of the auditor general for the sale of his lands for nonpayment of the taxes, and when the drain is about completed, to attack the validity of the proceedings. Auditor General v. Meize, 124 Mich. 285, 82 N. W. 886.

An adjudication by a board of supervisors that a petition for the draining, leveeling, and reclaiming of land conforms with the statute governing the same, may not be inquired into in a collateral proceeding. Oliver v. Monona County (Iowa) 80 N. W. 510.

A property owner notified of a sewer-tax levy, and given opportunity to appear before the proper authorities on grievance day, but who neglected to do so, and failed to take any steps to contest the validity of the assessment, will not be permitted, in an action to enforce the assessment, and in the absence of any serious jurisdictional defect, to attack the sewer proceedings collaterally. Ithaca v. Babcock, 36 Misc. 49, 72 N. Y. Supp. 519.

The validity of a judgment for delinquent assessments for the construction of a sewer cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that there was an insufficient description of the premises or of the improvement. Jebb v. Sexton, 84 Ill. App. 45.

A corporation organized under the provision of the California Political Code for the purpose of reclaiming swamp and overflowed land is quasi public in character, the legality and regularity of the proceedings leading up to whose final creation cannot be collaterally attacked in an action to enforce an assessment levied on land in the district. Reclamation Dist. No. 342 v. Turner, 104 Cal. 334, 37 Pac. 1088.

One standing silently by, not objecting and seeing a public ditch constructed over his land in good faith under a proceeding of which he had due notice, cannot defeat an assessment for the benefits thereof to his land on a collateral attack in an action to quiet title, on the ground that the law under which the ditch was constructed was invalid for lack of details. Cass County v. Plotner, 149 Ind. 116, 48 N. E. 635.

That the lands in a reclamation district were swamp and overflowed, and that lands assessed for reclamation purposes would be benefited thereby, being jurisdictional facts, which the board of supervisors necessarily determine in approving the petition for the formation of the district, its judgment on those questions where all the parties were brought before it by proper notice is conclusive, and cannot be collaterally attacked. People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 171.

But in England an assessment by a commissioner of sewers is not conclusive, but the person assessed may, in an action brought against a person for taking his goods to satisfy the assessment, prove that he acquired no benefit from the sewer. Stafford v. Hamston, 2 Brod. & B. 691, 5 J. B. Moore, 608.

Injunction.

There are some defects, however, which will warrant a resort to equity and the issuance of an injunction.

An injunction will lie against drainage proceedings which are void, but not if they are merely erroneous or irregular. Sunier v. Miller, 105 Ind. 393, 4 N. E. 867.

An action to enjoin a city from assessing plaintiff's property for construction of a sewer is premature if brought before any apportionment or levy of tax has been made. Kansas City v. Smiley, 62 Kan. 718, 64 Pac. 613.

But not when it appears that the amount of such assessment has been ascertained and notice thereof given to the property owners. Andrews v. Love, 50 Kan. 701, 31 Pac. 1094.

Equity will entertain jurisdiction of a suit to cancel special tax bills issued for the construction of a sewer, even though they be void, as they constitute a cloud on the title. Bayha v. Taylor, 36 Mo. App. 427.

An action is not maintainable in equity to enjoin the collection of a special assessment for the construction of a sewer or the transmission to the county auditor of a statement of the amount claimed to be due for such sewer assessments for the purpose of collection, as there is an ample remedy at law under the statute for illegal assessments. Fajder v. Aitkin (Minn.) 92 N. W. 332.

Injunction will not lie to restrain the construction of a drain or ditch for errors or defects in the proceedings establishing the same, where the proceedings may be reviewed by petition in error. Haff v. Fuller, 45 Ohio St. 495, 15 N. E. 479.

The construction of a drain or sewer will not be enjoined at the suit of a property owner liable to be assessed therefor, where he has an adequate remedy at law. Schulz v. Albany, 27 Misc. 51, 57 N. Y. Supp. 963.

An action in equity to restrain the sale of land for an unpaid sewer assessment will not lie when the assessment on the face of the proceedings to impose it is a valid lien upon the land, and extrinsic evidence is required to show its invalidity. Longley v. Hudson, 4 Thomp. & C. 353.

Where an assessment, in proceedings to open a drain from a highway, of private property, has been made by appraisers as provided by statute, and objections have been filed by the landowner in the county court as authorized by the statute, which gives such court power to hear the case with the aid of a jury, the landowner cannot abandon the proceedings and enjoin the construction of the ditch on the ground that no court has declared that the land should be taken, and that the same has never been condemned, nor compensation paid, as required by statute. Shoppert v. Martin, 137 Mo. 455, 38 S. W. 967.

Landowners cannot enjoin the proceedings for the construction of a drain on the ground that the proposed new ditch will so increase the flow of water in an old ditch as to exceed its capacity and overflow such owner's land, where the proceedings are in pursuance of a statute providing ample legal remedy by an appeal from the assessment of benefits and damages, and by a suit for damages for the overflow of all lands subject to assessment. Ploughe v. Boyer, 38 Ind. 113.

A suit to enjoin the collection of a portion of an additional ditch assessment which has been adjudged void is a collateral attack, and cannot be sustained on the ground that the original assessment should have been deducted therefrom. Duncan v. Lankford, 145 Ind. 145, 44 N. E. 12.

A landowner cannot enjoin the collection of an assessment for the construction of a public ditch on the ground that the ditch was not constructed according to the plans and specifications, thereby resulting in no benefit to his land, where the proceedings establishing the ditch and levying the assessment were in conformity with the law, and that law makes it the duty of the officers having the work in charge to have the same done according to the plans and specifications, and affords landowners an opportunity to be heard in respect to the final completion of the ditch. Studabaker v. Studabaker, 152 Ind. 89, 51 N. E. 933.

The construction of a sewer will not be enjoined by a suit of property owners in front of whose premises the sewer is being built, on the ground that the proceedings authorizing it are illegal and void, where the real estate of such owners is not invaded, and they are not injured by the work complained of, but simply seek to avoid an illegal assessment, since ample remedies at law exist therefor. Shulz v. Albany, 42 App. Div. 437, 59 N. Y. Supp. 233.

Bill to quiet title.

The owner and occupant of land cannot compel the city to prosecute at law its claim under an invalid sale of the property to satisfy a special sewer assessment whereby his title is clouded, but he may maintain a bill under the statute to clear his title. Chaffee v. Detroit, 53 Mich. 573, 19 N. W. 191.

Quo warranto.

An owner of land cannot resist the payment of a special assessment levied on his land by the commissioners of a drainage district by a bill in equity, on the ground that the enlargement of the district, by which action the land in question was included, was illegally made. Whether the commissioners proceeded in all respects as required by the drainage laws is a question which cannot be raised by a bill to enjoin the collection of the assessments thereof, but must be by quo warranto proceedings. Evans v. Lewis, 121 Ill. 478, 18 N. E. 246.

The owner of land in a drainage district, organized under the drainage law of a state, has ample remedy at law against the district for the improper exercise by the drainage commissioners of their authority, by attempting to levy an assessment on his land in excess of benefits, also by appropriating certain drains and filling up others on his land without making just compensation therefor; and such acts constitute no ground for interference by quo warranto. People ex rel. Samuel v. Cooper, 139 Ill. 461, 29 N. E. 872.

Where the various steps for the organization of a drainage district are taken in conformity with the statute, the finding of the court in favor of the petitioners and organizing the district binds all who might have objected thereto, and quo warranto will not lie to test its validity,—especially where the interests involved are mainly of a private character. People v. Wild Cat Special Drainage Dist. 31 Ill. App. 219.

c. Grounds of contesting.

In general it may be said that any departure from the constitutional or statutory procedure for the perfecting of an assessment against private property is a ground for resisting the assessment in some form. Therefore, the decisions upon what is or is not essential to the assessment as set out above should be consulted. The decisions collected in this subdivision deal with actual objections which have been made.

Amount of assessment.

The question whether a lot was benefited by the construction of a sewer cannot be raised in an action to collect an assessment against the lot. Wray v. Fry (Ind.) 62 N. E. 1004.

That particular property within a sewer district is not in fact benefited by construction of the sewer will not prevent the collection of the assessment made upon it. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Phillips, 111 Iowa, 377, 82 N. W. 787.

The objection that the objector's land has no access to the sewer, or that the sewer is no benefit as the land has access to other sewers, cannot be raised on an application for judgment and order of sale of land under a special assessment for a sewer, but should be raised on the confirmation of the assessment. Vanderseyde v. People ex rel. Raymond, 195 Ill. 200, 61 N. E. 1050, 62 N. E. 806.

The question as to whether an owner's property was assessed in excess of benefits, or more or less than its proposed share of the cost of a sewer, cannot be raised on the application for judgment against such land for such assessment. The proper place to raise those questions is on the application to confirm the assessment. Walker v. People ex rel. Kochersperger, 170 Ill. 410, 48 N. E. 1010.

The fact that an assessment on an owner's land to aid in the construction of a drain is too high, although otherwise valid, will not defeat an action thereon, but only goes to reduce the amount of recovery. New Eel River Draining Assn. v. Durbin, 30 Ind. 173.

But the report of appraisers as to lands benefited by drainage by a draining association and assessing the same is only prima facie evidence, in a suit to enforce the lien of such assessment, where the statute authorizing assessments for such purposes by such association permits land-owners to deny that the work is of public utility, that their lands are benefited thereby to the amount of the assessment, or that for any other reason they should be compelled to pay the assessment or any part of it. Eel River Draining Assn. v. Topp, 16 Ind. 242.

But the defense that land was not benefited, and that it was arbitrarily and excessively assessed without regard to proportionate benefits, may be raised in an action to enforce an assessment for reclamation district purposes, where no hearing on the question of benefits is provided except by way of defense to suits for the collection of assessments, so that the charge on the land does not become final until the determination of such a suit. Lower Kings River Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 806, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335.

And this view was adopted in Reclamation Dist. No. 551 v. Runyon, 117 Cal. 184, 49 Pac. 131, which was an action by the district seeking a determination of the validity of an assessment, in which the trial court had excluded evidence on behalf of a landowner showing that his land was wholly reclaimed, and had been provided at his own expense with a suitable pumping plant and drainage facilities, as well as evidence that the land in question was more heavily assessed than land similarly situated.

A dedication of a part of an abutting lot for street purposes, subsequent to a sewer assessment, is not ground for a reduction of the assessment. 60 L. R. A.

assessment, where no claim for personal judgment against the owner is made, but it is only sought to enforce the assessment against the property originally liable. Wilson v. Cincinnati, 5 Ohio N. P. 68.

The amount of an assessment on lots abutting on a sewer improvement which does not exceed the statutory limit cannot be reduced by showing that in reality the sewer is of no benefit to the lots in question. Conner v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio C. C. 336.

The fact that the proposed drain will be an open ditch from 10 to 15 feet wide does not necessarily imply that such drain will be an injury to the land, which will warrant the court in setting aside an assessment on it for benefits resulting thereto, levied by the commissioners of the drainage district without awarding damages for injuries, but who reported that no lands would be injured by the drainage or the construction thereof,—especially as the county court confirmed their report, and it does not appear that anyone claimed any damages for the construction of such drains over his land. Huston v. Clark, 112 Ill. 344.

Evidence that the construction of a drain does not benefit an owner's land, but injures it, is inadmissible in an action by a ditching association to collect an assessment of benefits thereon for the construction of the drain, where the statute under which the proceedings are had provides a remedy by appeal to review the question of benefits. Moffit v. Medaker Draining Assn. 48 Ind. 107.

An assessment for a completed work in draining lands will not be set aside as excessive upon objections supported only by general opinions, previous lower estimates, a proved offer to do at a lower price a certain item of work which cost more, nor by testimony that the lands assessed are, in the opinion of witnesses, not worth as much as the improvement cost, in the absence of particulars of a proper expenditure by exact measurements, and accurate calculations by competent engineers, and of explicit denials of services charged for and disbursements made. Rc Pequest River, 42 N. J. L. 553.

The judgment of a state court rendered on the appeal of a railroad company from the action of drainage commissioners is conclusive upon the question of benefits and damages accruing to the railroad from the improvement of a navigable stream passing under the track; and, although the judgment assesses benefits but no damages, the improvement will not be enjoined on the ground that the railroad will be put to great expense in rebuilding its bridge, and its interstate commerce and mail service will be interrupted. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. Smith, 61 Fed. 885.

An owner of property abutting on an alley cannot collaterally attack the validity of an assessment thereon for the construction of a small collateral drain therein in connection with a local sewer in a parallel street, on the ground that his property was already provided with adequate drainage by a sewer in the street upon which his property fronts, where the right to make the assessment was within the letter of the statute under which the sewer was constructed and the assessment levied, and he had failed to avail himself of his right to remonstrate against the assessment at the proper time. Byram v. Foley, 17 Ind. App. 629, 47 N. E. 351.

Noncompletion of improvement.

The fact that a drain was not completed according to the terms of the contract is not ground for injunction against the collection of an assessment, as a legal remedy exists for any damages sustained therefrom. Barber v. Rankin, 154 Ind. 236, 56 N. E. 225.

The collection of an assessment for a county ditch, the contractors for which had been paid, will not be enjoined on the ground that, owing to the negligence of the engineer having charge thereof and fault of the contractors, therefore, the ditch was defectively constructed and inadequate to drain plaintiffs' lands, if plaintiffs had a remedy on the bonds of the engineers and contractors, and knowingly allowed such ditch to be so constructed without complaining thereof. Putnam County v. Krauss, 53 Ohio St. 628, 42 N. E. 831.

Proceeding void.

It is not necessary, in order to obtain equitable relief, to show that taxes for the construction of a sewer were not only invalid but inequitable, where the provision of a city charter under which they were assessed was unconstitutional and void. Diets v. Neenah, 91 Wis. 422, 64 N. W. 299.

The owner of land across which a ditch is constructed under an unconstitutional statute is, subsequent to the completion of the work, entitled to an injunction restraining the collection of an assessment therefor, when he had no actual notice that the improvement was being made, had not stood by and permitted the work to be done for his benefit, and he was not guilty of any want of diligence in failing to assert his right before the work was completed. Teegarden v. Davis, 36 Ohio St. 601.

Irregularities and inequalities.

By the New York act of 1874, substantial error is made a ground for vacating a drainage assessment. Re Van Buren, 17 Hun, 527.

It is no defense to an action to enforce the payment of an assessment on lands for the construction of a drain, that more land of another person is assessed than is mentioned in the petition for the application of appraisers as being affected by the drain. Bate v. Sheets, 50 Ind. 329.

The erroneous assessment of a water tax against premises does not invalidate the entire assessment on the roll, or excuse the taxpayer from the payment of a sewer assessment. Hooker v. Rochester, 30 N. Y. Supp. 297.

That inequality exists in the assessment of the cost of reclaiming swamp land will not defeat the assessment if there is no direct and invidious discrimination in favor of certain persons to the prejudice of others. Hagar v. Reclamation Dist. No. 108, 111 U. S. 701, 28 L. ed. 569, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663.

Authority of officers.

The authority of drainage commissioners to act in the matter of opening the ditch cannot be attacked for the first time on motion for new trial after a decree establishing the ditch and laying assessment for benefits. Goodwine v. Leak, 127 Ind. 569, 27 N. E. 181.

Persons upon whom is imposed a drainage assessment cannot question the existence of the corporation and the authority of the officers imposing the assessment, since such matters can only be questioned by proceeding by quo warranto, where there was a de facto corporation assuming to exercise powers with reference to the drainage. Blake v. People use of Caldwell, 109 Ill. 504.

Upon an appeal from an assessment of benefits made against lands for the construction of a drain under the provisions of a ditching law authorizing such appeal, but failing to provide 60 L. R. A.

as to the manner of taking it or how the appeal is to be disposed of in the appellate court, the legality of the organization of the ditching company cannot be questioned. Foster's Branch Ditching Co. v. Makepeace, 45 Ind. 226.

Misdescription.

Misdescription of benefited land in the viewers' report or on the tax duplicate will not enable a landowner to defeat liability for a drainage assessment or the lien of a ditch certificate. Baker v. Clem, 102 Ind. 109, 26 N. E. 215.

A landowner may have an assessment on his land for the construction of a ditch set aside where the petition for its establishment and the notice properly described the land, but erroneously gave the name of the owner as the grantor of the present owner, contrary to an express provision of the statute requiring that the petition "give the names of owners thereof if known, and, when unknown, shall so state." Troyer v. Dyar, 102 Ind. 896, 1 N. E. 728.

Counterclaim.

Proceedings upon a municipal claim for the construction of a sewer being exclusively in rem, there can be no certificate for a balance claimed by way of set-off. Philadelphia use of Jones v. O'Connor, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 230.

Upon application for judgment against lands to pay a special assessment ordered by a drainage district, the owner is not entitled to a set-off or credit for the value of old ditches on his land used by the drainage district. Under the drainage law such allowance should have been made at the time the assessment was levied, and comes too late after the assessment has been confirmed. People ex rel. Barber v. Chapman, 128 Ill. 496, 21 N. E. 507.

Fund already raised.

It is no defense to the payment of a special assessment levied upon land in a drainage district for benefits thereto by the drainage system established, that the work has been completed and paid for by other landowners who did not refuse to pay their assessments. Hammond v. People, 169 Ill. 545, 48 N. E. 573.

That the construction of a drainage ditch was paid for out of general funds of the county contrary to law will not relieve the owners of property benefited from liability to pay their assessments, since the money received by the assessment may be substituted for that paid out. Patterson v. Baumer, 43 Iowa, 477.

No right of way.

The fact that the right of way for a drain over an owner's land had not been procured will not bar a suit to compel the payment of an assessment for benefits to his land by the construction of the proposed drain. Large v. Keen's Creek Draining Co. 30 Ind. 263, 95 Am. Dec. 696.

That decision is not in accord with Re Rhineland, 68 N. Y. 105, and Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232.

But the owner of land upon one side of a street, having the fee to the center, cannot defeat an assessment for a sewer placed in the street on the ground that the municipal corporation did not obtain title to the street where he does not show that the sewer was not located on the portion of the street to which he did not have title by authority of its owners. Re Ingraham, 64 N. Y. 311, Affirming 4 Hun, 495, where it was held that there had been a dedication of the street to the public.

d. Benefit must be paid.

One who seeks to restrain by injunction the execution of deeds for property sold to satisfy a special assessment upon it for a drain must do equity by paying the amount which his property has been benefited by the improvement. Darst v. Griffin, 31 Neb. 668, 48 N. W. 819.

The collection of a sewerage tax will not be restrained on the ground of irregularities in the proceedings to collect the tax, in the absence of payment or tender of the amount conceded to be due. Gillette v. Denver, 21 Fed. 822.

An assessment on land for the construction by a municipal corporation of a sewer will not be set aside on a collateral attack in an action to quiet title, on the ground that the assessment exceeds 10 per cent of the assessed value of the property taxed prohibited by law, unless that part of the assessment except the excess is paid or tendered by the landowner, since the assessment is void only as to the excess. Elkhart v. Wickwire, 121 Ind. 331, 22 N. E. 342.

A landowner is estopped from attacking the validity of a ditch proceeding by a suit to quiet title after sale of his land for an assessment, unless he first pay or tender the benefits resulting to his land thereby, represented by the assessment levied thereon, where he stands by without objecting until after the ditch beneficial to his land has been constructed in good faith under color of statutory proceeding, and the rights of others have intervened. Prezinger v. Harness, 114 Ind. 491, 16 N. E. 495; Presinger v. Fording, 114 Ind. 599, 16 N. E. 499.

e. Laches.

The assessment and collection of a drain tax will not be enjoined on the ground that the complainant will not derive any benefit, where he had knowledge of the improvement, and did not commence his suit until the expense of constructing the drain had been incurred and orders had been issued for the work. Walker Twp. v. Thomas, 123 Mich. 290, 82 N. W. 48.

A person who sees a drain under construction which will be calculated to benefit his property cannot wait until it has been completed, the expenditure has been made, and his property has received the benefit, before proceeding to avoid the tax. Darst v. Griffin, 31 Neb. 668, 48 N. W. 819.

A party who objects to the construction of a ditch upon the ground of want of jurisdiction of the board of commissioners to order it should proceed with reasonable promptness in asserting his objections, and not wait until the ditch is completed, and thus be enabled to receive all the benefits to be derived from it before asserting the want of authority. Dakota County v. Cheney, 22 Neb. 437, 35 N. W. 211.

Certiorari to review proceedings to lay out a ditch or drain under the statute will not be allowed to one who suffered its construction and use for over a year without objection; but he will be relegated to de novo proceedings to have it altered or abolished. Haines v. Camplin, 18 N. J. L. 49.

One seeking a review by certiorari of the proceedings to assess lands for the cost of draining under a drainage act must move promptly. Delay until a large portion of the assessment has been collected and applied will constrain the court to refuse relief. State, Britton, Prosecutor, v. Blake, 35 N. J. L. 208.

A delay of ten months by inhabitants and taxpayers of a town before bringing their bill to restrain payment of money for expense already incurred in draining a pond under authority of the town is such laches as will preclude a right to equitable relief. Fuller v. Melrose, 1 Allen, 166.

But in one case it was held that the right of a citizen, as against the municipal corporation, to have a lien for an unlawful sewer assessment stricken off cannot be lost by laches. "Assessments of this nature are a species of taxation, and, in laying and collecting them, the city exercises the delegated power of the state. It is manifestly unjust for the state to take advantage of the oversight or omission of a citizen, and to exact from him a tax that cannot constitutionally be imposed." Harrisburg v. Hoak, 9 Pa. Dist. R. 51.

f. Waiver.

Taxpayers are usually held to waive objections to mere irregularities when they do not urge them at the proper time. Even when the effect of their silence is not such as to raise an estoppel, they should not be permitted to bring forward objections which are in fact comparatively immaterial, and which, if seasonably made, would have enabled a correction of the irregularities. The entire assessment should not be set aside in favor of one who was not sufficiently interested to assist in keeping the proceedings within the proper channels.

The objections to drainage assessments which could have been urged at the time of the confirmation of the assessment roll will be waived by neglect to urge them at that time. Blake v. People use of Caldwell, 109 Ill. 504.

One benefited by the construction of a drain will not be relieved from the payment of the assessment made against him, but will be held to have waived all irregularities, where he was notified of, and took part in, the proceedings without making objection. Hall v. Slaybaugh, 69 Mich. 484, 37 N. W. 545.

But the failure of a landowner present at the proceedings taken before a drain commissioner for the establishment of a ditch to object thereto is not a waiver of defects in the proceedings amounting to more than an irregularity. Walters v. Chamberlin, 65 Mich. 333, 32 N. W. 440.

Although in Houston v. Wheeler, 52 N. Y. 641, it was held that the assent of a landowner to acts under a drainage act is a waiver of the right to question its constitutionality.

A petitioner for a drain, who released the right of way and consented to all the proceedings, but objected to those taken for the purpose of raising the tax to pay for its construction, cannot be heard to complain of irregularities in the proceedings for the purpose of evading payment of the tax assessed upon his lands. Cook v. Covert, 71 Mich. 249, 39 N. W. 47.

A resident of a municipal corporation will not be permitted to set aside proceedings for the construction of a sewer which has resulted in an assessment against his property because of defects in the proceedings, where, with knowledge of the facts, he permitted the sewer, which would be a great benefit to his property, to be completed without any objection from him. State ex rel. Schlntgen v. La Crosse, 101 Wis. 208, 77 N. W. 167.

A landowner, duly notified of the proceedings at the time of the establishment of a ditch, cannot, after the final judgment of the court establishing it and confirming the assessment of benefits and damages, to which he filed no remonstrance, and after the construction of the ditch, file an intervening petition asking for an allowance of damages to his land on the ground that at the time of its establishment he was unable to discover that the proposed drain would not benefit his land, but would be an injury thereto. Hoefgen v. Harness, 148 Ind. 224, 47 N. E. 470.

Where the owner of lands knew of the proposed construction of a drain across his land, having been present at a meeting of drainage commissioners, but having given them no notice that he was the owner of the land, he has no standing in court to object, in a subsequent proceeding, to the construction of the drain. Hackett v. Brown, 128 Mich. 141, 87 N. W. 102.

An injunction will not be granted at the suit of a property owner to restrain the collection of an assessment for the construction of a sewer on the ground of fraud by the placing therein, by the contractor, of rings instead of other connection, where no serious damage has been done thereby; and such owner stood by and permitted the work to be completed, instead of enjoining its completion. Blanchard v. Columbus, 8 Ohio S. & C. P. Dec. 676.

g. Estoppel.

Where the taxpayer has not only failed to urge his objections at the proper time, but has permitted the work to go forward and money to be expended on the faith of his conduct, the principle of estoppel will prevent him from denying liability for the assessment.

Courts are not inclined to set aside sewer assessments when the improvement was solicited by the parties attacking the assessment, who have seen the improvement made and permitted the city to incur large expense without objection, and thereafter seek to be relieved from assessment for the benefits received by them. Loomis v. Little Falls, 66 App. Div. 299, 72 N. Y. Supp. 774.

But one who petitions for the establishment of a ditch is not thereby estopped from complaining of illegal proceedings to his prejudice, since he is supposed to have petitioned for legal, and not illegal, action on the part of the commissioner. Taylor v. Burnap Drain Comrs. 39 Mich. 739.

Property owners who stand by and, without objecting, receive the benefit of a sewer, are estopped to attack collaterally the legality of the proceedings for mere irregularity. New Albany Gaslight & Coke Co. v. Crumbo, 10 Ind. App. 360, 37 N. E. 1082.

An injunction will not be granted restraining the collection of an assessment for the construction of a ditch, even if the proceedings are void for nonconformity to the statute, where the objecting party, on whose land the ditch has been in part or in whole constructed, has stood by and failed to resort to any remedy, legal or equitable, until after the ditch was made. Kellogg v. Ely, 15 Ohio St. 66.

The collection of drainage assessments will not be restrained on the ground of their invalidity, at the instance of property owners who signed the petition for the construction of the drain, and remained silent during its construction, of which they knew, and did not object until after the completion of the drain. Turnquist v. Cass County Drain Comrs. (N. D.) 92 N. W. 852; Erickson v. Cass County (N. D.) 92 N. W. 841.

A landowner who remains silent until a drain is partially constructed under statutory authority, knowing that the only method of compensating those who performed the labor is by an assessment for the benefits, cannot, after the benefits have been reaped, maintain a bill in equity to set aside the proceedings for alleged irregularities. Moore v. McIntyre, 110 Mich. 237, 68 N. W. 130.

Property owners who petition for the laying of water, surface, and sewer pipes, and thereafter permit the city to do the work and reap the benefit of it, cannot question the validity of the assessment therefor on the ground that the city had power to make the improvements and assess the property benefited only in case of the refusal or neglect of the property owners to make such improvements. Loomis v. Little Falls, 66 App. Div. 299, 72 N. Y. Supp. 774.

A bill to set aside proceedings to establish a drain and to enjoin collection of the tax will be dismissed where the complainant joined with others in releasing the right of way, bid off the work for two sections, and deferred filing the bill until the tax, with a single other exception, had been paid. Harwood v. Huntoon, 51 Mich. 639, 17 N. W. 216.

The owner of private property will be estopped from making any claim to compensation for the construction of a sewer over his land by a municipal corporation in pursuance of an ordinance providing for the same, where the construction was made with his knowledge, and he made no objections thereto, and took no steps to prevent it. Hyde Park v. Borden, 94 Ill. 26.

An owner of abutting property who, by reason of living in the vicinity of a sewer improvement, knew, or should have known, that the same was being constructed partly on her property, and stood by and said nothing, is estopped from relating the validity of an assessment for such work, in an action brought to restrain the enforcement thereof, as her remedy is by an action against the municipality for the appropriation to its use of such property or the imposition of an additional servitude thereon. Wilson v. Cincinnati, 5 Ohio N. P. 68.

A landowner who stands by and sees the construction of a ditch without objecting until after its completion is estopped from afterwards suing out an injunction on the ground that the statutory requirement as to the giving of notice of the letting of the contract was not complied with, and the contract was let at a higher price than it should have been. Muncey v. Joest, 74 Ind. 409.

A landowner is estopped from denying the validity of an assessment levied against his land for the construction of a drain on the ground that a previous assessment had been made but was set aside, where the first assessment was invalid, and was set aside, and a new one was made at the request and with the consent of such owner, and he expressed himself satisfied therewith, and stood by and allowed the ditching company to expend money on the faith of it. Nevins & O. C. Twp. Draining Co. v. Alkire, 36 Ind. 189.

A landowner in a drainage district having recognized the validity of an assessment levied therein, and consented to a compromise of difference between the landowners and bondholders of the district, whereby the latter gave up substantial rights, is estopped from disputing the validity of such assessment. People v. Weber, 164 Ill. 412, 45 N. E. 723.

Not all conduct, however, will work an estoppel, and there are some defects which cannot be cured by estoppel.

The failure of a property owner to object to the construction of a sewer does not estop him from subsequently contesting the validity of the special tax bill issued therefor, where he at the time had no knowledge of the invalidity of the proceedings. St. Joseph ex rel. Danaher v. Dillon, 61 Mo. App. 317.

A landowner who appears before the jury in a drain proceeding, accepts the award made him, and enters into a contract to construct a portion of the drain, is not thereby estopped from contesting, on the ground of irregularity, an assessment for the drain imposed upon land owned by him, where he had no notice of the assessment until the roll was completed and it was too late for him to appeal from the action of the drain commissioner. Tinsman v. Monroe County, 90 Mich. 382, 51 N. W. 460.

A landowner is not estopped from denying the validity of an assessment on his land for the construction of a ditch on the ground that he had no notice, by silently standing by without objecting and allowing the work to be done on the ditch and money expended in its construction knowing that the same was being done on the faith of the validity of the proceedings, in the absence of proof as to the value of the work done and the amount of money expended, as estoppels cannot be created by bare intendments so as to cut one off from availing himself of the right to notice secured to him by the organic law. Scudder v. Jones, 134 Ind. 547, 32 N. E. 221.

A member of the common council which authorized a sewer improvement and directed the levying of an assessment therefor is not estopped from taking exception to the assessment made against him, where he has not in any manner recognized the roll as valid, or taken action upon it. Warren v. Grand Haven, 30 Mich. 24.

A property owner is not estopped from denying his liability on a tax bill for the construction of a sewer on the ground that the contract was invalid by reason of the fact that he knew of the existence of the proceedings and of work being done thereunder, and failed to attempt to stop it. Keane v. Klausman, 21 Mo. App. 485.

Landowners are not estopped from enjoining an assessment for sewerage and other improvements because in excess of the positive prohibitive provision of statute, by having joined in the petition for the improvements, and, with knowledge of the progress of the work, having raised no objection thereto in regard to the proceedings under which it was constructed; since they could have no knowledge of the amount of the assessment until made, and until they had such knowledge, it was their right to assume that it would be in conformity with the law. Birdseye v. Clyde, 61 Ohio St. 27, 55 N. E. 169.

A landowner is not estopped from attacking, by direct proceedings, the validity of a sewer assessment which is void because not levied according to benefits, but solely according to location, contrary to statute, by silently standing by and allowing the improvement to proceed and accepting the benefits thereof after knowledge of the manner in which it was to be made, as he had a right to assume that the assessment would be levied at least under color of statute. Crawfordsville Music Hall Asso. v. Clements, 12 Ind. App. 464, 39 N. E. 540, 40 N. E. 752.

Landowners against whose lands assessments have been levied by a city for the cost of a sewer are not estopped from denying the validity of the assessments because they allowed the work to progress to completion without objection, where the city was without authority to construct the sewer, and therefore the objection to the assessment is jurisdictional. Keese v. Denver, 10 Colo. 112, 15 Pac. 825.

A landowner is not estopped from enjoining the collection of an assessment for the construction of a drain, on the ground that he had stood by without giving notice of his dissatisfaction, and permitted the ditching company to expend a large sum of money in constructing the drain by which his land was benefited, where, by reason of fatal defects in the articles of association, such company was not legally incorporated, and, therefore, all the subsequent proceedings were invalid. Newton County Draining Co. v. Nofsinger, 43 Ind. 566.

The facts that an owner did not appeal from an assessment upon his lands for the construction of a ditch, but stood by and saw the work done without objecting; that the course of the ditch through his premises was changed at his instance; that $100 was expended for his benefit in constructing the ditch through his land; and that he did not question the legality of the assessment until after the work was completed,—do not estop him, in an action to enforce the assessment, from insisting upon its illegality because of defective description of the land. Boatman v. Macy, 82 Ind. 490.

A landowner who stood by without objection until the improvement was made is not thereby estopped from objecting to the proceeding which would lead to a decree directing a sale of his land to pay an assessment a part of which is clearly not upon his land. Hunt v. State use of Downey, 26 Ind. App. 518, 58 N. W. 557.

Connecting with sewer.

A landowner is not estopped from contesting a void sewer assessment by connecting with the sewer. State, New Brunswick Rubber Co., Prosecutor, v. New Brunswick Street & Sewer Comrs. 38 N. J. L. 190, 20 Am. Rep. 380.

An abutter on a street in a town through which a sewer is constructed, who enters the sewer with his private drain by license from the municipal authorities by which he agrees to make no claim for damages on account of the work, is not estopped to contest the validity of the order laying out the sewer under which an assessment is levied on him. Sheehan v. Fitchburg, 131 Mass. 523.

Connecting property with a sewer will not estop its owner from contesting the right of a municipality to assess the expenses of the sewer upon abutting property on the ground that it had no legislative authority to do so. Watertown v. Fairbanks, 65 N. Y. 588.

A property owner is not made liable on a void special tax bill issued for the construction of a sewer by the fact that he connected his property with and used the sewer. Neill v. Trans-Atlantic Mortg. Trust Co. 89 Mo. App. 644. The court said: Defendant had no lot or part in employing the contractor to build the sewer. The street is his property subject to the easement of the public. He, therefore, finds on his property an underground drain called a sewer. Why may he not use it without paying for it when it has been put there without his request, and, it may be, against his consent? We have the highest authority for saying that when one finds a structure upon his property which has been placed there without his request, or direction, or consent, he cannot be made liable for its cost by using it.

But when one proceeds to avail himself of sewer privileges by making his own connections, though through the pipe of an obliging neighbor, he waives any mere irregularity in constructing the sewer and by implication promises to pay the reasonable amount fixed by the regulations. Fergus Falls v. Boen, 78 Minn. 156, 80 N. W. 961.

And in one case it was held that when a property owner applies for, and is granted a connection with a proposed sewer none of the proceedings of the municipal corporation in contracting for the sewer require his ratification to make him liable for the charge therefor. Fitzgerald v. Philadelphia, 3 Walk. (Pa.) 17.

h. Suit to recover back money paid.

In an action to recover drain taxes paid under protest, the plaintiff is not entitled to show that his land was so remote that it was not benefited by the drain. Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. W. 22.

A drain tax paid under protest in reliance upon § 42, act No. 153, Mich. Laws 1885, cannot be recovered, since such act applies only to the general taxes authorized to be assessed thereby, and not to a special tax for drainage purposes. Taylor v. Avon Twp. 73 Mich. 604, 41 N. W. 703.

Assumpsit will not lie to recover drain taxes paid under protest on the ground that the statute under which they were imposed is unconstitutional, where the statute is valid in part, and the unobjectionable provisions confer full power to assess the tax. Mathias v. Cramer, 73 Mich. 5, 40 N. W. 926.

A landowner who has stood by and permitted a drain to be constructed without attempting to impeach the validity of the proceeding will not be permitted to do so in an action to recover drain taxes paid under protest. Smith v. Carlow, 114 Mich. 67, 72 N. W. 22.

A city cannot be compelled to reimburse drainage taxes voluntarily paid and actually expended for drainage purposes. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. New Orleans, 30 La. Ann. 1371.

A drainage tax paid by a landowner will not be refunded, although by statute his property is subsequently excluded from the drainage district, where it appears that, when the canals in process of construction are completed, his land will be drained. New Orleans Canal & Bkg. Co. v. New Orleans, 27 La. Ann. 505.

But one who pays an illegal drain tax under protest to one who is about to levy on his property is entitled to recover back the amount, although the protest was not specific as to reasons of illegality. A specific protest is only required by statute in case of the payment of a tax in advance of the time the tax can be enforced. Cox v. Welcher, 68 Mich. 263, 36 N. W. 69.

1. Other matters.

A proceeding, under a statute, to establish a ditch and assess the cost thereof on the lands specially benefited, is not a civil action so as to fall within a provision of the Code concerning civil cases, authorizing the court, in its discretion, to relieve the party from its judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect on complaint or motion filed within two years, so as to relieve a landowner from a judgment assessing his lands, to which he was prevented from filing remonstrances by sickness. Hays v. Tippy, 91 Ind. 102.

A mortgagee of land is not estopped by a judgment against the mortgagor in an action to which he was not a party, establishing a ditch assessment to be a lien upon the land, from questioning the validity of the ditching proceedings and the judgment, where his mortgage was duly recorded prior to the commencement of any of such proceedings, and the judgment creditor is seeking to enforce his lien as superior and prior to that of the mortgage. Debaner v. Simpson, 72 Ind. 435.

A contestant of a sewer assessment who fails to obtain a reduction thereof in an action brought to enforce the same must pay the penalty prescribed by a statute, providing that, if special assessments payable by the owner of the property assessed, personally, by the time stipulated in the ordinance, are not paid by the time so stipulated, the amount assessed with interest and the prescribed penalty may be recovered by suit, as such penalty becomes due on failure to pay at the stipulated time the amount rightfully owing; but, against a contestant securing a reduction because the assessment was more than that allowed by law, no such penalty can be recovered, as at no time was the amount claimed from him owing. Cincinnati use of Wilson v. Fugman, 5 Ohio N. P. 14; Cincinnati v. Jung, 7 Ohio N. P. 665.

XI. Abandonment of drain.

When an artificial drain has become necessary to the drainage of adjoining lands, it is to be considered and treated as a natural water course so far as proceedings looking to its abandonment are concerned, and it comprises such a property right as will be protected by injunction. Tussing v. King, 65 Ohio St. 10, 60 N. E. 986.

A municipal corporation, such as a reclamation district, cannot be deprived of its existence by nonuser of its powers or a failure on the part of its officers to act as a corporation, but only by act of the legislature or a judicial sentence based upon legislative provision and sufficient facts. Swamp Land Dist. No. 150 v. Silver, 98 Cal. 51, 32 Pac. 866.

But the dissolution of a drainage district, under the provision of an act of the legislature, cannot be prevented by a single landowner who will be damaged by such dissolution, in the absence of any statutory provision authorizing such action. Hollenbeck v. Detrick, 162 Ill. 388, 44 N. E. 732.

In the exercise of the right of drainage districts to take land by condemnation to be used for a ditch, there are none of the elements of a contract which would be impaired by a subsequent dissolution of the district. The damages awarded an owner for land taken for such use include, in contemplation of law, all loss or injury resulting to him thereby. Ibid.

An act of the legislature for the dissolution of drainage districts is not in conflict with a constitutional provision authorizing the general assembly to pass laws permitting owners or occupants of lands to construct drains across lands of others. A drainage district created for such purpose by a public act is a corporation of a public character, and the law providing for its organization is subject to be modified or repealed. Ibid.

ST. LOUIS MERCHANTS' BRIDGE TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY, App.

(.....Mo.....)

1. A member of a section gang engaged in repairing the track to enable trains to run safely over it, who is stationed beneath a track running over a public street into which discarded ties are being thrown, to warn travelers on the street and remove the ties, is, while attempting to remove beyond danger a child which has appeared in the street, within the protection of a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries sustained by any servant or agent thereof while engaged in the work of operating such railroad, by reason of the negligence of any other servant or agent thereof.

2. A statute making a railroad company liable for injuries to servants through the negligence of fellow servants does not violate the equality clause of the Federal Constitution, although it does not confine such liability to acts performed in the operation of trains, but extends it to risks similar to those incurred by the employees of persons or corporations engaged in other lines of work.

(Robinson, J., dissents.)

(December 10, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by negligence for which defendant was responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the division opinion which was delivered by MARSHALL, J., and was as follows:

This is an action predicated upon § 2873, Rev. Stat. 1899, for damages for personal injuries, by the plaintiff, an employee of the defendant, alleged to have been received in consequence of the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants, employees of the defendant. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $6,500 in the circuit court, and the defendant appealed.

The pertinent allegations of the petition are as follows: "That the defendant was a corporation, and operated a railroad in the state of Missouri. That on the 15th day of November, 1898, the plaintiff was in the service of the defendant, aiding in operating its railroad at or near the bridge approach over Ferry street, in the city of St. Louis. That it was the duty of the plaintiff at said time to watch that people or vehicles were not injured by the fall of ties which were being removed by defendant's employees from its roadbed, and thrown down about 50 feet to the surface of Ferry street; and also to remove such ties from the street. That the rule and custom for doing the work was for the men above, before throwing a tie down to the street, to give notice to the man below that a tie was to be thrown, and then wait for a signal from him, before throwing the tie, that it was right and safe to throw the tie, thus enabling plaintiff to warn passers-by out of danger and to keep out of danger himself. That on the day in question, whilst the plaintiff, in the due discharge of his said duty, was warning off and removing a chid from said street, where it was in peril of a falling tie, should one be thrown, the defendant's servants above carelessly, and without giving any warning of their intention to throw down a tie, and, without receiving any signal from plaintiff that it was safe to do so, threw down a tie, which struck and injured the plaintiff."

There was a further assignment of negligence, in that defendant's acting foreman negligently directed the tie to be so thrown without the usual signals. The answer is a general denial, coupled with the following special pleas: "Further answering plaintiff's petition, defendant states: That the injuries complained of by plaintiff in said petition were produced by the negligence of plaintiff contributing to the cause thereof. That plaintiff's fellow servants gave warning of their intention to lower the tie mentioned in plaintiff's petition, and plaintiff failed to heed the same. That it was usual and customary, in the lowering of the ties mentioned in plaintiff's petition, for plaintiff to notify his co-employees of the approach of pedestrians or vehicles, so that such ties might be held by said co-employees until such pedestrians or vehicles had passed; and plaintiff failed to give such notice in this instance, and by reason of the failure of plaintiff to so warn the employees of defendant of the approach of the pedestrian mentioned in plaintiff's petition, as was his duty, such tie was lowered and thrown down, whereby plaintiff was injured. That plaintiff failed and neglected to take reasonable and ordinary precautions to observe his surroundings, or to avoid the obvious dangers of his said situation, and thereby said injury was directly occasioned by his own omission to use ordinary care at and immediately before the time of his said injury. Further answering, defendant says that the injury complained of by plaintiff was occasioned by a danger incident to his said employment, and which plaintiff assumed in entering upon said employment. Further answering, defendant says that, if the injury complained of by plaintiff was occasioned by the negligence of defendant's servants, as alleged in plaintiff's petition, the said servants were fellow servants of plaintiff, and plaintiff and said fellow servants were not, at the time mentioned in plaintiff's petition, engaged in the work of operating defendant's railroad, and therefore defendant is not liable therefor." The reply is a general denial.

The trial disclosed the following facts: The defendant's railroad crosses Ferry street, in the city of St. Louis, by an overhead bridge, which is some 50 feet above the level of the street. The plaintiff was a member of a section gang that was engaged in repairing the railroad by taking out old ties and putting in new ones. When the old ties were taken out, they were thrown down onto Ferry street, instead of being carried away. The plaintiff was stationed on Ferry street to warn passers-by of the danger, and to remove the ties that were thus thrown upon the street. When the gang on the bridge were about to throw down a tie, they notified the plaintiff of their intention, and he signified to them whether or not the "coast was clear," and they did not throw the tie unless he so signified. While so engaged in such work, a small child appeared on Ferry street, and was in a place of peril. The plaintiff went to her, and, while engaged in removing her, the gang on the bridge threw a tie down on the street, which struck the plaintiff on the leg, and injured it so that it had to be amputated. The gang on the bridge gave the plaintiff no notice of their intention to throw the tie, and the plaintiff did not signify to the gang on the bridge that it was unsafe to do so, nor that the child was in peril, nor that he was going to or had gone to the child to remove it from its perilous position.

Two legal propositions present themselves upon this record: First, Who are embraced in the provisions of § 2873, Rev. Stat. 1899? and, second, Does the plaintiff come within such classes? and of these in their order.

1. Who are embraced in the provisions of § 2873, Rev. Stat. 1899? That section is as follows: "That every railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this state shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof while engaged in the work of operating such railroad, by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof: Provided, that it may be shown in defense that the person injured was guilty of negligence contributing as a proximate cause to produce the injury." The defendant contends that this law does not embrace every employee of a railroad, but that it applies only to such employees of a railroad as are subjected, by the character of the work they are employed to do, to the hazards incident to the running of a train. And, furthermore, the defendant contends that, if the law is construed to cover railroad employees who are not subjected to such hazards, but are only subject to such risks as would be incurred by the employees of any other person or corporation when engaged in similar work, then the law violates the equality clause of the Federal Constitution, in that it subjects the defendant to a liability to its employees that is not imposed upon any other person or company under similar conditions. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the law embraces, not only the employees who are actually employed in moving a train, but also all those whose work is directly essential to enable the trains to move; and, as applied to this case, that it embraces a section gang engaged in repairing the track to enable the trains to safely run over it, and that the plaintiff was a member of such section gang, and that his duty was as directly connected with such work as was the work of any of the other members of the gang that were working upon the bridge. This case is one of first impression in this court. The only case bearing on this question that has heretofore been adjudicated in this state is Stubbs v. Omaha, K. C. & E. R. Co. 85 Mo. App. 192. In that case the Kansas City court of appeals, speaking through Ellison, J., held that the law embraced members of a section gang that was engaged in removing old rails and putting in new ones, and there one of the gang was permitted to recover for injuries received by the negligence of another member of the gang in suddenly dropping ping one end of a rail which he and the plaintiff were carrying. It is all-important to keep in mind the language of the statute. It is that the railroad shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad" by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof. Defendant contends that this statute was taken from the laws of Iowa, and that the interpretation of the courts of that state construing their law must be borrowed from that state along with the law itself, and that the courts of Iowa hold that the law only embraces such employees as are injured by the actual moving of trains, and therefore the same construction should be placed upon our statute. The chief difficulty encountered in such a line of reasoning is that there is nothing to show that our law was borrowed from or modeled after the Iowa law. The language of our law is quite different from the Iowa statute. The first statute upon this subject that was adopted in Iowa was the act of 1862, which was as follows: "Every railroad company shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of the company, in consequence of any neglect of the agents, or any mismanagement of the engineer or other employee of the corporation to any person sustaining such damages." Acts 9th Gen. Assem. p. 198. The courts of that state held that this act was limited to such employees as were injured by the negligence of fellow servants while engaged in moving trains, and that any other construction of the act would constitute class legislation, and would violate the equality clause of the Federal Constitution. Deppe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 52. Afterwards, in 1873, the legislature of that state amended the law so as to make it read as follows: "Every corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of such corporation, in consequence of the neglect of agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineers or other employees of the corporation, and in consequence of the wilful wrongs, whether of commission or omission, of such agents, engineers, or other employees, when such wrongs are in any manner connected with the use and operation of any railway on or about which they shall be employed." Code 1873, § 1307. In Foley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 644, 21 N. W. 124, it was argued that this amendment did not change the act of 1862 as to liability for mere acts of negligence, but that it simply superadded a liability for wilful wrongs. But the supreme court held otherwise, and said that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to create one liability for negligent wrongs and a different liability for wilful wrongs, and then adhered to the rule laid down in the Deppe Case. And the same rule had obtained in that state ever since. Malone v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 417, 54 Am. Rep. 11, 21 N. W. 756; Reddington v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 108 Iowa, 96, 78 N. W. 800. It will be observed that in both of the Iowa acts the railroad was made liable for damages sustained by any person, including employees, "in consequence of any neglect of the agents, or any mismanagement of the engineer or other employee of the corporation to the person sustaining such damages." Our statute is quite different, for it makes the railroad liable to any employee for damages sustained by him, "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad, by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant." Under the Iowa cases, any employee who is injured by another employee's negligence while moving a train can recover. It matters not what work the injured employee is doing. The test is, Was he injured in consequence of the negligence of another employee or engineer in moving a train? Under our statute, to entitle the injured servant to recover, it must be shown that he sustained his injuries, "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad," "by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant." This is very different from the Iowa statute. Here the injured person must be injured "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad;" injured, not necessarily by the negligence of another employee or engineer while actually moving a train, but injured by the negligence of any other employee of the railroad. In Iowa the injury must have been inflicted by the moving of a train. In Missouri the person injured must have been actually engaged in the work of operating such railroad, not necessarily in operating the train. The two statutes, therefore, are almost the antitheses of each other, and our law cannot properly be said to have been taken from or modeled after the Iowa law. The major premise of the defendant's syllogism therefore fails, and hence the conclusion falls with it.

The fellow-servant laws of other states and the judicial interpretations thereof afford interesting and legitimate subjects of reference in construing our law on that subject. The statute of Kansas (Gen. Stat. 1901, § 5858) is almost identical with the statute of Iowa of 1862. It is as follows: "Every railroad company organized or doing business in this state shall be liable for all damages done to any employee of such company in consequence of any negligence of its agents, or by any mismanagement of its engineers or other employees, to any person sustaining such damage." The Kansas courts, however, place a very different construction upon their statute from that placed upon the Iowa statute by the courts of that state. The rule in Kansas is that, to entitle an injured employee to recover, it is necessary for him to show that he was injured when performing a service for the railroad that was necessary to the use and operation of the road, and it is not essential that he show that the injury was caused by a fellow servant while moving a train. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vincent, 56 Kan. 344, 43 Pac. 251. This case is similar in all essential respects to the case of Stubbs v. 60 L. R. A.

Omaha, K. C. & E. R. Co. 85 Mo. App. 192. See also Union Trust Co. v. Thomason, 25 Kan. 2, where one section hand's negligence caused injury to another section hand while both were on a hand car; Union P. R. Co. v. Harris, 33 Kan. 421, 6 Pac. 571, where one section hand's negligence injured another section hand while the two were taking out old rails and putting in new ones; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Koehler, 37 Kan. 463, 15 Pac. 567, where the negligence of one employee while unloading a car caused a rail to fall on another employee similarly employed; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Brassfield, 51 Kan. 167, 32 Pac. 814, where a section gang was unloading ties from a car for the purpose of repairing the track, and one negligently let a tie fall on another employee, and injured him; Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Pontius, 52 Kan. 264, 34 Pac. 739, where one bridge carpenter negligently injured another while loading timbers on a car to be carried to another part of the road to be used in a bridge. The case last cited went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and is reported in 157 U. S. 211, 39 L. ed. 675, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Chief Justice Fuller, after setting out the Kansas statute, said: "In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 33 Kan. 298, 6 Pac. 291, the validity of this law was drawn in question on the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution of the United States, and its validity sustained. The case was brought here on error, and the judgment of the state court affirmed. 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161. As to the objection that the law deprived railroad companies of the equal protection of the laws, and so infringed the 14th Amendment, this court held that legislation which was special in its character was not necessarily within the constitutional inhibition if the same rule was applied under the same circumstances and conditions; that the hazardous character of the business of operating a railroad seemed to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations, having for its object the protection of their employees as well as the safety of the public; that the business of other corporations was not subject to similar dangers to their employees; and that such legislation could not be objected to on the ground of making an unjust discrimination, since it met a particular necessity, and all railroad corporations were, without distinction, made subject to the same liabilities. It is now contended that the plaintiff was a bridge builder; that the legislation only applied to employees exposed to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads; that the railroad company could not be subjected to any greater liability to its employees who were engaged in building its bridges than any other private individual or corporation engaged in the same business; and that the statute has been so construed in this case as to make the company liable to its employees when engaged in building its bridges, notwithstanding bridge building was not accompanied, and had not been treated by legislation as accompanied, by peculiar perils, thus discriminating against the particular corporation irrespective of the character of the employment, in contravention of the 14th Amendment. But the difficulty with this argument is that the state supreme court found upon the facts that, although the plaintiff's general employment was that of a bridge carpenter, he was engaged at the time the accident occurred, not in building a bridge, but in loading timbers on a car for transportation over the line of defendant's road; and Missouri P. R. Co. v. Haley, 25 Kan. 35; Union P. R. Co. v. Harris, 33 Kan. 416, 6 Pac. 571, and Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Koehler, 37 Kan. 463, 15 Pac. 567, were cited, in which cases it was held that a person employed upon a construction train to carry water for the men working with the train, and to gather up tools and put them in the caboose or tool car; a section man employed by a railroad company to repair its roadbed, and to take up old rails out of its track and put in new ones; and a person injured while loading rails on a car to be taken to other portions of the company's road,—were all within the provisions of the act in question; and the court said: 'In this case the plaintiff was injured while on a car, assisting in loading timbers to be transported over the defendant's road to some other point. The mere fact that the plaintiff's regular employment was as a bridge carpenter does not affect the case, nor does it matter that the road was newly constructed, nor whether it was in regular operation or not. The injury happened to the plaintiff while he was engaged in labor directly connected with the operation of the road, and the statute applies even though it should be given the construction counsel places on it.' And see Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Stahley, 11 C. C. A. 88, 27 U. S. App. 157, 62 Fed. 363."

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Stahley, 11 C. C. A. 88, 27 U. S. App. 157, 62 Fed. 363, a railroad employee was injured by the negligence of his fellow employees in letting drop one end of a heavy iron driving rod that they were carrying to attach to a new locomotive that was standing in a roundhouse at Horton, Kansas, and which they were putting in order for use on the road. Mr. Justice Brewer tried the case on the circuit, and held that, notwithstanding the Kansas fellow-servant law was taken from the Iowa statute, the Federal courts would follow the interpretation put on the Kansas statute by the courts of that state. Accordingly, a judgment for the plaintiff was allowed to stand, notwithstanding the injury was not inflicted by the negligence of a fellow-servant while moving a train. The fellow-servant statute of Georgia (Civ. Code, § 2321) is as follows: "A railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of such company, or for damage done by any person in the employment and service of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company." The court of that state held that an injured employee may recover for injuries sustained by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant if they were engaged in a work that was necessary to be done to enable the railroad company to operate the railroad, and that the right to recover was not limited to cases where the injury was caused by the running of a train. Thompson v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. 54 Ga. 509; Baker v. Western & A. R. Co. 68 Ga. 702; Georgia R. Co. v. Ivcy, 73 Ga. 504. In the case last cited one bridge builder was killed by the negligence of another bridge builder, while they were building a bridge across the Oconee river, at Athens, to enable the trains of the railroad to cross the river and land passengers and freight at a new depot in the town.

The supreme court of Wisconsin had the fellow-servant law of that state before it in the case of Ditberner v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Wis. 138, 2 N. W. 60, and, speaking through Lyon, J., said: "The learned counsel for the defendant maintains that the statute under which this action was brought (Laws 1875, chap. 173) is unconstitutional and void. The statute is as follows: 'Every railroad company operating any railroad or railway, the line of which shall be situated in whole or in part in this state, shall be liable for all damages sustained within this state by any employee, servant, or agent of such company, while in the line of his duty as such, and which shall have been caused by the carelessness or negligence of any other agent, employee, or servant of such company, in the discharge of, or for failing to discharge, their proper duties as such; but this act shall not be construed so as to permit a recovery where the negligence of the person so claiming to recover materially contributed to the result complained of.' It is claimed that this statute violates that principle of constitutional law which prohibits unequal and partial legislation on general subjects, and is therefore void. It is conceded that the act would be a valid exercise of legislative power were its provisions restricted to cases of injury caused by the negligent operation of railways. But it is assumed that the statute is not so restricted; that by its terms it seeks to make a railway company liable for an injury to an employee caused by the negligence of another employee, although the negligent act may have no connection with the operation of the railway of the company. The argument is that, because the same liability is not imposed upon other corporations, the statute is void, within the rule or Durkee v. Janesville, 28 Wis. 464, 9 Am. Rep. 500. Iowa cases have been cited which seem to assert the doctrine contended for. The statute of that state under which those cases were decided, corresponding with our chapter 173 of 1875, limits a recovery to cases where the injuries were caused by the negligent operation of railways. In view of that limitation, the assertion of the above doctrine in those cases seems to be obiter. It was unnecessary that the court should determine what its ruling would be were a different statute under consideration, or to rule upon a hypothetical statute. We entertain the highest respect for that learned and very able court, and can usually approve its judgments, but are unable to agree with it on this subject. Yet we concur in the judgments of that court in these very cases. We only reject the views stated arguendo, and which did not influence or affect the judgments."

The statute of Minnesota (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2701) is as follows: "Every railroad corporation owning or operating a railroad in this state shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof, by reason of the negligence of any other agent or servant thereof without contributory negligence on his part, when sustained within this state, and no contract, rule, or regulation between such corporation and any agent or servant shall impair or diminish such liability: Provided, that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to render any railroad company liable for damages sustained by any employee, agent, or servant while engaged in the construction of a new road or any part thereof not open to public travel or use." The supreme court of that state adopts the same rule as that laid down in Iowa, to wit, that the injuries must have been inflicted by the movement of a train, and holds that the statute so construed is not class legislation, or violative of the Federal Constitution, but says that, if the construction is extended beyond this, it would be subject to those objections. Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L. R. A. 419, 45 N. W. 156.

The fellow-servant law of Indiana is the most sweeping and comprehensive of any. It is as follows: (1) That "every railroad or other corporation, except municipal, operating in this state, shall be liable in damages for personal injury suffered by any employee while in its service, the employee so injured being in the exercise of due care and diligence, in the following cases: First. When such injury is suffered by reason of any defect in the condition of ways, works, plant, tools, and machinery connected with or in use in the business of such corporation, when such defect was the result of negligence on the part of the corporation, or some person intrusted by it with the duty of keeping such way, works, plant, tools, or machinery in proper condition. Second. Where such injury resulted from the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation, to whose order or direction the injured employee at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform. Third. Where such injury resulted from the act or omission of any person, done or made in obedience to any rule, regulation, or by-law of such corporation, or in obedience to the particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the corporation in that behalf. Fourth. Where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person in the service of such corporation who has charge of any signal, telegraph office, switch yard, shop, round house, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway, or where such injury was caused by the negligence of any person, coemployee, or fellow servant engaged in the same common service in any of the several departments of the service of any such corporation, the said person, coemployee, or fellow servant, at the time acting in the place and performing the duty of the corporation in that behalf, and the person so injured, obeying or conforming to the order of some superior at the time of such injury, having authority to direct; but nothing herein shall be construed to abridge the liability of the corporation under existing laws." [Horner's Rev. Stat. (Ind.) 1901, § 5206a]. This statute came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Tullis v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 175 U. S. 348, 44 L. ed. 192, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136, and the opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Fuller is so pertinent to the case at bar that it is deemed proper to reproduce it in full. It is as follows:

"The contention is that the act referred to is in conflict with the 14th Amendment because it denies the equal protection of the laws to the corporations to which it is applicable. In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Montgomery, 152 Ind. 1, 49 N. E. 582, the statute in question was held valid as to railroad companies, and it was also held that objection to its validity could not be made by such companies on the ground that it embraced all corporations except municipal, and that there were some corporations whose business would not bring them within the reason of the classification. In announcing the latter conclusion the court ruled, in effect, that the act was capable of severance; that its relation to railroad corporations was not essentially and inseparably connected in substance with its relation to other corporations; and that, therefore, whether it was constitutional or not as to other corporations, it might be sustained as to railroad corporations. In Leep v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 58 Ark. 407, 23 L. R. A. 264, 25 S. W. 75, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 64 Ark. 83, 37 L. R. A. 504, 40 S. W. 705, an act of Arkansas of March 25, 1889, was held unconstitutional by the supreme court of that state so far as affecting natural persons, and sustained in respect of corporations; and in St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Paul, 173 U. S. 404, 43 L. ed. 746, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419, that view of the act was accepted by this court because that court had so decided. Considering this statute as applying to railroad corporations only, we think it cannot be regarded as in conflict with the 14th Amendment. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick, 127 U. S. 210, 32 L. ed. 109, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1176; Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Pontius, 157 U. S. 209, 39 L. ed. 675, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 585; Pearce v. Va. Dusen, 24 C. C. A. 280, 47 U. S. App. 339,"

Fed. 693; Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, 172 U. S. 557, 43 L. ed. 552, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 281. In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey the validity of a statute of Kansas of 1874 providing that 'every railroad company organized or doing business in this state shall be liable for all damages done to any employee of such company in consequence of any negligence of its agents or by any mismanagement of its engineers or other employees to any person sustaining such damage,' was involved, and it was held that it did not deny to railroad companies the equal protection of the laws. Mr. Justice Field said: 'The hazardous character of the business of operating a railway would seem to call for special legislation with respect to railroad corporations, having for its object the protection of their employees as well as the safety of the public. The business of other corporations is not subject to similar dangers to their employees, and no objections, therefore, can be made to the legislation on the ground of its making an unjust discrimination. It meets a particular necessity, and all railroad corporations are, without distinction, made subject to the same liabilities. As said by the court below, it is simply a question of legislative discretion whether the same liability shall be applied to carriers by canal and stage coaches and to persons and corporations using steam in manufactories.' In Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Herrick the same conclusion was reached in respect of a law of the state of Iowa, that 'every corporation operating a railway shall be liable for all damages sustained by any person, including employees of such corporation, in consequence of the neglect of agents, or by any mismanagement of the engineers or other employees of the corporation, and in consequence of the wilful wrongs, whether of commission or omission, of such agents, engineers, or other employees, when such wrongs are in any manner connected with the use and operation of any railway on or about which they shall be employed, and no contract which restricts such liability shall be legal or binding.' In Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Pontius a bridge carpenter employed by a railroad company, who was injured through the negligence of employees of the company while assisting in loading timber taken from the false work used in constructing a bridge on a car for transportation to another point on the company's road, was held to be an employee of the company within the meaning of the statute of Kansas, and the validity of that act was again affirmed. In Peirce v. Van Dusen a similar statute of the state of Ohio applying to railroad companies was upheld by the circuit court of appeals for the sixth circuit, Mr. Justice Harlan delivering the opinion of the court. In Orient Ins. Co. v. Daggs, in which an act of the state of Missouri in respect of policies of insurance against loss or damage by fire was drawn in question, the objection that the statute discriminated between fire insurance companies and companies engaged in other kinds of insurance was overruled, and it was said that the power of the state to distinguish, select, and classify objects of legislation necessarily had a wide range of discretion; that it was sufficient to satisfy the demands of the Constitution, if the classification were practical, and not palpably arbitrary, and that the classification of the Missouri statute was not objectionable in view of the differences between fire insurance and other insurance. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161, and Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 32 L. ed. 585, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207, were cited and approved. And see Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Pacific Exp. Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. 339, 35 L. ed. 1035, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Matthews, 174 U. S. 96, 43 L. ed. 909, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 609.

"By reason of the particular phraseology of the act under consideration, it is earnestly contended that the decisions sustaining the validity of the statutes of Kansas, Iowa, and Ohio are not in point, and that this statute of Indiana classified railroad companies arbitrarily by name, and not with regard to the nature of the business in which they were engaged; but the supreme court of the state in the case cited has held otherwise as to the proper interpretation of the act, and has treated it as practically the same as the statutes of the states referred to. Indeed, the Iowa statute is quoted from, and the Case of Beckwith, as well as that of Mackey, relied on as decisive in the premises. As remarked in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. McCann, 174 U. S. 580, 586, 43 L. ed. 1093, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, the contention calls on this court to disregard the interpretation given to a state statute by the court of last resort of the state, and, by an adverse construction, to decide that the state law is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. 'But the elementary rule is that this court accepts the interpretation of a statute of a state affixed to it by the court of last resort thereof.' This being an action brought by Tullis to recover damages for an injury suffered while in the employment of the railroad company, caused by the negligent act of a fellow servant, for which the company was alleged to be responsible by force of the act, we answer the question propounded that the statute, as construed and applied by the supreme court of Indiana, is not invalid, and does not violate the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

It thus appears that everywhere, except in Iowa and Minnesota, the adjudications agree that it is not essential that the injury should have been inflicted by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant while actually engaged in running a car, but that the injured employee may recover if injured by the negligence of a fellow servant while they are engaged in doing any work for the railroad which was directly necessary for the operation of the railroad, and that even so sweeping a statute as that of Indiana was held by the Supreme Court of the United States not to be repugnant to, or violative of, the Federal Constitution. Under the language of our statute it is necessary for the injured employee to show that he was injured "while engaged in the work of operating such railroad." Construed either by its own terms or in the light of the cases cited from other jurisdictions, it results in holding that the right to recover is not limited to cases where the injury is inflicted by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant while actually moving a train or engine, but that the law embraces all cases where the injury is inflicted upon an employee while engaged in the work of operating a railroad, by reason of the negligence of any fellow servant who is likewise engaged in the work of operating a railroad, and that the term "operating such railroad" includes all work that is directly necessary for running trains over a track, and that it includes section hands who are engaged in working upon, repairing, or putting in shape the track, roadbed, bridges, etc., over which the trains must run.

2. The next question is whether the plaintiff falls within the class embraced in the act. Section gangs are included. The plaintiff was a member of the section gang that was doing the work. The work being done was directly necessary for the operation of the road. The particular work the plaintiff was doing was to warn passers-by of the danger incident to the negligent manner in which this work was being done, and to remove the ties from the street after the other members of the section gang had thrown them from the bridge to the street. Therefore, the work the plaintiff was doing was a part of the work being done by the section gang of which he was a member. It was negligence for the gang to throw the ties from the bridge down onto the street without first learning from the plaintiff that it was safe to do so. The practice before the accident was for them to first ascertain that fact from the plaintiff. In this instance they did not do so. They were negligent. The child was in a place of peril. The plaintiff went to it to remove it. He had a right to rely upon it that no ties would be thrown down until he notified the gang that it was safe to do so. He was, therefore, in the discharge of his duty. He was engaged in the work of operating the railroad. He was within the protection of the law. He was not guilty of contributory negligence. He is therefore entitled to recover, and therefore the verdict and judgment of the trial court are right.

The objection that the first portion of the plaintiff's instruction leaves it to the jury to determine as a question of fact whether the plaintiff was engaged in operating the railroad, while such was the question of law, is not tenable. Whether the plaintiff was engaged in operating the railroad at the time he was injured was a mixed question of law and fact. The instruction required the jury to find the fact to be that the defendant was "a section hand laborer, aiding in the work of operating defendant's road," and then declared that, if such was the fact, 60 L. R. A.

he was entitled to recover. Properly construed, this instruction only means that the jury must not only find the plaintiff to be a section hand laborer, but that he was at the time of the injury actually engaged in working upon the railroad as such. The instruction, though perhaps not as clearly worded as it might have been, was not erroneous.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

And

THIRD NATIONAL BANK of Springfield,

(.....Mo.....)

1. A mortgage by the holder of a bill of sale of chattels which the seller did not at the time possess is not notice to one who takes a mortgage from the seller upon chattels which he has purchased to fill the requirements of the bill of sale, since it is outside of the chain of the latter's title.
2. A mortgage executed in the name of a third person, on chattels not yet acquired by the mortgagor, which does not purport to cover after-acquired property, does not bind such property as against a mortgage to another person, executed by the mortgagor in his own name, after the property has come into his possession.
3. A mortgage of chattels to be acquired is not valid against one who takes actual possession of them under another mortgage executed by the mortgagor after they are acquired by him.

spective defendants under chattel mortgages. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Haff & Michaels, Isaac E. Congdon, John W. Parish, Beardsley, Gregory, & Kirshner, and Robert F. Walker, for appellants:

This is a bill of interpleader. It is strictly a proceeding in equity.

Freeland v. Wilson, 18 Mo. 382; Miller v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. 68 Mo. App. 22; Atchison Bd. of Edu. v. Scoville, 13 Kan. 26.

The evidence shows conclusively that there was no intention on the part of either Gillett or Baumbaugh that the transaction of October 4, 1898, should constitute a sale of the cattle and corn by Gillett to Baumbaugh. For this reason Baumbaugh's mortgage of that date is void, independent of the provisions of the statute of frauds.

The pretended sale was in any event void under the statute of frauds.

Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 112, § 3.

It was not accompanied by a change of possession, and this threw the burden of proof as to good faith and sufficient consideration upon the respondents.

But respondents made no proof of good faith, or of sufficient consideration.

Gillett had exclusive control, management, and use of, and interest in, the property.

Dodson v. Cooper, 50 Kan. 683, 32 Pac. 370; Potter v. Stevens, 40 Mo. 229; Potter v. McDowell, 31 Mo. 62.

Baumbaugh did not acquire actual or constructive possession of any of the cattle on or before October 14, 1898. He never personally at any time had possession.

Nor did Baumbaugh ever have any constructive possession of the cattle.

This court must assume that the law of Kansas is the same as the law of Missouri so far as this agreement of sale between Gillett and Clark is concerned. The transaction between Clark and Gillett under the Missouri law amounts to nothing more than an option or an executory contract of sale.

Messrs. Charles H. Dummer and Dehson & McCune, also for appellants:

The T and C cattle described in the bill of sale from Gillett to Baumbaugh, and the mortgage from Baumbaugh to the A. J. Gillespie Company, both dated October 4, 1898, were not only not owned by the grantors, but were not in existence in contemplation of law. The property mortgaged not being in existence at that time, the mortgage was absolutely void.

The bill of sale from Gillett to Baumbaugh, of October 4, 1898, was also a nullity and absolutely void, for the same reason. i. e., the nonownership and nonexistence of the property.

The mortgage of Baumbaugh to the A. J. Gillespie Commission Company is void as to the T and C cattle for the further reason that it does not by its terms attempt to convey future acquired property.

As the Gillespie Commission Company, the mortgagee, and its assignee, the Springfield bank, never at any time got possession of the T and C cattle prior to the time our lien attached, or in fact at any time, the Springfield bank has no right, in law or equity, to said cattle or the proceeds of the sale thereof, as against the Northwestern National Bank, which did obtain actual possession thereof under its chattel mortgage.

scribed in the mortgage under which we claim, on October 4, 1898, the time of the execution of the mortgage by Baumbaugh to the A. J. Gillespie Commission Company, and possession was not delivered to the mortgagee at the time, said mortgage last named was absolutely void as against all subsequent purchasers and creditors, under the statutes and decisions of Kansas.

Messrs. Stewart Taylor and C. O. Tichenor, for respondent Third National Bank of Springfield:

If Baumbaugh did not own the cattle when he made the mortgage, even he could not say when he got the title that he did not own them at the date of the mortgage, for the title so acquired would relate back.

United States v. Loughrey, 172 U. S. 225, 43 L. ed. 427, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 153.

Granting that the facts raised a suspicion that Gillett at the time intended to execute the mortgages of appellants and thereby defraud them, yet that is not evidence of fraud.

United States v. Hancock, 133 U. S. 197, 33 L. ed. 604, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 264; Farmers' Bank v. Worthington, 145 Mo. 91, 46 S. W. 745.

If there was a purpose to defraud others by Gillett executing chattel mortgages as he did, it would be irrelevant here.

Dickerman v. Northern Trust Co. 176 U. S. 181, 44 L. ed. 423, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 311.

Under the Kansas statute there can be no recording of the bill of sale, and there need be no actual change of possession; but, if there is not, then it devolves upon the purchaser to show that "the sale was made in good faith, and upon a sufficient consideration."

Briggs v. United States, 143 U. S. 354, 36 L. ed. 184, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Couse, 17 Kan. 571; Crawford v. Spencer, 92 Mo. 505, 4 S. W. 713.

If a sale of cattle which Gillett did not then own, and which were paid for by Baumbaugh, is valid, and if he did buy these cattle to comply with his agreement, and did get the actual and physical possession of them, this gave no power to Gillett to mortgage or sell them, because they did not belong to him; he did not even have a lien on them for the purchase money.

Lamar Water & Electric Light Co. v. Lamar, 140 Mo. 157, 39 S. W. 768.

If Gillett got the actual and physical possession of these cattle, the title then vested in Baumbaugh; and if Baumbaugh had put a mortgage on the same at the time the Gillett agreement was made, the title would have related back to the date of the mortgage.

If this mortgage was upon record it would have been notice that Baumbaugh was owner.

Gillett never was in the actual and physical possession of one of these cattle. When the time came for the original owners to part with their possession, Baumbaugh had become entitled to it. Gillett under such circumstances manifestly could not have sold or encumbered these cattle, even in this state; nor could they have been seized for his debts.

The cattle, which the opinion styles "after-acquired," and for that reason holds our mortgage to be invalid, had been acquired before the execution of the Baumbaugh mortgage. They would not have been acquired had it not been for the Baumbaugh mortgage.

The effect of the decision is to take the property of one party and give it to another, or, at least, to decree a forfeiture of the property of another.

This court takes these cattle, paid for by us, and gives them to persons to whom mortgages were given some time afterward.

It is a maxim that equity looks to the intent, and not to form. It always looks at the substance of things, and attempts to reach that and to enforce the rights and duties which spring from that and the real intent of the parties.

Varnier v. Rice, 44 Ark. 252.

If the Clark note and mortgage were taken up, as the transaction shows it to have been, and held until the company could get a new valid mortgage, why is not the Clark mortgage valid if the Baumbaugh mortgage on the same cattle is invalid? And why is not the Springfield bank subrogated to the rights of the Gillespie company, the indorser of the Baumbaugh notes?

Messrs. Cook & Gossett and J. D. Bowersock for other respondents.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity by the plaintiff, as a stakeholder, to require the defendants to interplead for the sum of $14,971.03, in its hands, resulting from the sale of 403 head of cattle, which were consigned to it by the defendants, to be sold by it to the best advantage, and the proceeds to be held by it pending an amicable settlement among the defendants of their respective claims. They were unable to agree, and therefore the plaintiff filed this bill of interpleader to have the claimants litigate their rights. The defendants interpleaded for the fund. Pending the determination of the case the parties agreed that, instead of paying the money into court, the plaintiff might retain the fund, paying interest thereon. The trial court adjudged the fund to the Third National Bank of Springfield, Massachusetts, and the other defendant banks, and Elmore & Cooper appealed. The abstract of the record embraces 525 printed pages. The briefs of counsel aggregate 217 pages. It is manifestly impossible, therefore, within the limits proper to be observed in any opinion, to give even an outline of the testimony, documentary evidence, and circumstances adduced upon the trial. Time and space admit only of a short, clear statement of the ultimate facts disclosed by the record, to serve as a basis for the principles of law to be discussed and decided.

Ultimate facts.

Prior to October 3, 1898, Grant G. Gillett, living at Woodbine, Dickinson county, Kansas, was a large stock dealer. Charles H. Baumbaugh, of the same place, was his brother-in-law, and for some time had been employed by him as a clerk at a salary of $50 per month. The A. J. Gillespie Commission Company was a corporation located at Kansas City, Kansas, and engaged in the business of dealing in cattle and buying and selling notes secured by chattel mortgages on cattle. Gillett was a stockholder, but not an officer, in the company. On October 3, 1898, E. R. Clark, of Marion county, Kansas, was the owner of, and had on pasturage in Chase county, 416 head of cattle four years old, called "westerns," and weighing 1,100 pounds, and branded J. M. or , the latter mark being called "circle dot." Clark had mortgaged these cattle to Elmore & Cooper for about $15,000. On October 3, 1898, the Gillespie Commission Company, at the request of Gillett, bought from Elmore & Cooper the Clark mortgage on said cattle, and carried it as "Bills receivable" until October 5th, when it was paid by the proceeds of the Baumbaugh mortgage, hereinafter described. On October 4, 1898, Gillett and Baumbaugh went to the office of the Gillespie Commission Company in Kansas City, Kansas, for the purpose of executing a mortgage on the cattle covered by the Clark mortgage. Gillett did not want to make the mortgage himself, for fear, he said, of injuring his credit. So he arranged with Baumbaugh that he (Gillett) would give Baumbaugh a bill of sale for the 416 head of cattle owned by Clark, and Baumbaugh, should execute a mortgage on them to the Gillespie Commission Company, and that Gillett should get the proceeds of the mortgage and manage the whole matter, and Baumbaugh should have a half interest in the profits realized. Instead of making the mortgage on the 416 Clark cattle alone, it was agreed that the mortgage should be made to cover 600 head of cattle, and that Gillett should go out and buy 184 more cattle, and add them to the Clark 416 cattle, thus filling the complement of 600. Thereupon Gillett executed to Baumbaugh the following bill of sale:

Kansas City, Oct. 4, 1898.
Bill of Sale.

State of Kansas, }
County of Dickinson } ss.:

This certifies that I have this day sold, assigned, and agreed to deliver to Charles H. Baumbaugh eighty-four (84) native four-year-old steers branded T— on left loin, one hundred (100) native four-year-old steers branded C on left hip, and four hundred and sixteen (416) western four-year-old steers branded J. M. or  on left side. The above cattle are all free, clear, and unencumbered. Also 20,000 bushels of corn, now in crib at Lebanon, Kansas. The consideration paid for the above-named cattle and corn is $24,795.99, which includes $300 commission and $495.99 interest.

G. G. Gillett.

Thereupon, on the same day, Baumbaugh executed a chattel mortgage to the Gillespie Commission Company to secure the notes aggregating $24,795.99, payable at ninety days. The description of the property in the mortgage is as follows: "The following steers: Eighty-four natives branded T— on left loin, four years old, and weight 1,150 pounds; also one hundred natives branded C on left hip, four years old, and weight 1,200 pounds; also four hundred and sixteen westerns, branded  or J. M. four years old, and weight 1,100 pounds; also twenty thousand bushels of corn. Said cattle are to be fed on the owner's farm, about 1 mile north of Herrington, Kansas. Said corn is now in crib at Lebanon, Kansas, and is to be shipped to Herrington, Kansas. When said stock is marketed, to be consigned for sale to A. J. Gillespie Com. Co., Kansas City Stock Yards, and proceeds applied on notes." At the time of the execution of the bill of sale and of the mortgage neither Gillett nor Baumbaugh owned any of the cattle described in those documents. Gillett had an option to buy the Clark 416 head of cattle for $40 a head, but he had not purchased them, or paid a farthing thereon. Neither Gillett nor Baumbaugh then owned or had in mind any cattle marked T & C nor were there any cattle answering such a description anywhere in existence. Upon the execution of the notes and mortgage by Baumbaugh they were turned over to Gillett, and by him turned over to the Gillespie Commission Company, and that company on the same day sold the notes and mortgage to the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company, and, after taking out $495.99 for interest and $300 for commissions, passed the balance of the proceeds, amounting to $24,000 to the credit of Gillett upon the books of the company. This credit was wiped out by a draft on the company by Gillett on October 5, 1898, for $16,000 (which was evidently intended to cover what the company had paid Elmore & Cooper for the Clark mortgage on October 3d), and by $8,000 cash paid to Gillett on October 10, 1898. Baumbaugh paid Gillett nothing for the cattle, and received nothing out of the proceeds of the notes and mortgages. He acted in the matter solely to oblige Gillett, and upon his promise that he should share in the profits. The bill of sale recites that Gillett "agreed to deliver" the cattle to Baumbaugh, but they were never intended to be delivered, and in fact never were delivered at any time to Baumbaugh, but the agreement was that Gillett should have the possession of them, should have his men care for them, should feed them, should market them, and should receive the proceeds of their sale.

At the time the mortgage was assigned to the Gillespie Commission Company that company knew that neither Gillett nor Baumbaugh owned or had in their possession any of the cattle described in the mortgage, but the company understood that cattle were to be bought to fill the description in the mortgage. On October 5, 1898, the Gillespie Commission Company sold and assigned the notes and mortgage to the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company, and informed that company at the time of the fact that neither Gillett nor Baumbaugh owned the cattle therein described, but they expected to buy cattle to fill the description in the mortgage. On October 15, 1898, the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company sold and assigned the notes to the Third National Bank of Springfield, Massachusetts, and that company knew nothing of the above-recited facts concerning the notes and mortgage, but was an innocent purchaser for value, and without notice. On October 7th Gillett sent his agent, Thomas Kirihaan, to Marion county, to get the J. M. and circle dot cattle from Clark, and he did get the 416 head from Clark, and drove them from the place where they were on pasture, 2 miles north of Clements, in Chase county, Kansas, which was about 30 miles from Herrington, Dickinson county; and with Clark's assistance and that of his men the cattle were driven to the Mosier farm, which was about a mile south of Herrington, arriving there on Sunday, October 9, 1898, where they were turned over to David Naill. The Mosier farm was owned by Gillett, and was leased by him to Naill, and Naill was employed by Gillett to care for and feed the cattle. About a week after such delivery to Naill, Gillett paid Clark the difference between the price of the cattle at $40 a head and the amount of the Clark mortgage to Elmore & Cooper that the Gillespie Commission Company had bought at the request of Gillett, and which that company had charged against Gillett's account on the 5th of October. On October 7th Gillett purchased 63 head of cattle from J. L. Thompson. They were delivered to Naill, as agent for Gillett, on October 8th, and were put in what is called the "schoolhouse pasture," which was owned by Naill, and was located about three-quarters of a mile northeast of the Mosier farm. On October 11th Gillett purchased 37 cattle from St. Amand, of Herrington, Kansas, and they were on that day delivered to Naill, for Gillett, and were placed in the said schoolhouse pasture. On October 13th Gillett purchased 100 cattle from Gangwer, of Delavan, Kansas, and they were also delivered on that day to Naill, for Gillett, and were placed in the said schoolhouse pasture. When these three lots of cattle were placed in the schoolhouse pasture, the parties have agreed that they were massed as one herd, and all branded T & C. On October 13th these T & C cattle were taken out of the schoolhouse pasture and placed in pens which lay partly in and partly outside of Herrington, and were known as "Gillett's stock yards," "Gillett's feed pens," or "Gillett's corral." Gillett had owned the land and had built the feed pens. He put the paper title in Baumbaugh; but whether Gillett or Baumbaugh was the real owner is not clear, nor is it material, for Gillett used the land and feed pens as he pleased, and put cattle in the pens and took them out again without consulting Baumbaugh. At the same time, to wit, October 13th, Gillett moved the J. M. and circle dot cattle (the Clark cattle) from the Mosier farm, and put them also in the said stock yards. Thus, on October 14th, Gillett had in his possession in his feed pens at Herrington, Kansas, 600 head of cattle. On October 14, 1898, Gillett executed to Elmore & Cooper three notes secured by three separate chattel mortgages, as follows:

First. A note for $7,000, due in one hundred fifty days. The mortgage securing this note described the property as follows: "The following described property in said county [Dickinson county]: 200 head four-year-old western dehorned steers, branded  and  heart on left side. These cattle were wintered in Kansas last winter, and weighed 1,000 pounds. These cattle are in my feed lot in the town of Herrington, and will not be removed therefrom until shipped to Elmore & Cooper, Stock Yards, Kansas City, Missouri. These cattle were bought from E. R. Clark, of Marion, Kansas. I also include in this mortgage 8,000 bushels of corn, together with all increase thereof." This note and mortgage was sold by Elmore & Cooper to the State Bank of St. Louis, before maturity, for value, and without notice, and that bank is the innocent holder thereof, and this is the claim asserted in its interplea.

Second. A note for $7,490, due in one hundred fifty days. The mortgage securing this note described the property as follows: "The following described property in said county [Dickinson county]: 214 head four-year-old western dehorned steers, branded J M on left side. These cattle were wintered in Kansas last winter, and weighed 1,000 pounds. These cattle are in my feed lot in the town of Herrington, and will not be removed therefrom until shipped to Elmore & Cooper, Stock Yards, Kansas City, Missouri. These cattle were bought from E. R. Clark, of Marion, Kansas. I also include in this mortgage 8,000 bushels of corn, together with all increase thereof." This note and mortgage was sold by Elmore & Cooper to the First National Bank of Omaha, before maturity, for value and without notice, and that bank is the innocent holder thereof, and this is the claim asserted in its interplea.

Third. A note for $8,000, due February 11, 1899. The mortgage securing this note describes the property as follows: "The following described property in said county [Dickinson]: 200 native steers, branded 100 T on left hip and 100 C on left hip. 63 of these cattle were bought from J. L. Thompson, of Herrington, Kansas, weight 1,200 pounds; 37 were bought from L. St. Amand, of Herrington, Kansas, weight 1,050 pounds; 100 were bought from Gangwer, of Delavan, Kansas, and weight 1,050 pounds. These cattle are on full feed in my lot at Herrington, and will not be removed from there until shipped to Elmore & Cooper, Stock Yards, Kansas City, Missouri. I also include 8,000 bushels of corn in this mortgage, together with all increase thereof." This note and mortgage was sold by Elmore & Cooper to the Northwestern National Bank of Chicago, before maturity, for value, and without notice, and that bank is the innocent holder thereof, and this is the claim asserted in its interplea.

All three of these mortgages contained a provision that, if the mortgagees deemed themselves insecure at any time, then the indebtedness should become due immediately, at the option of the mortgagees, and they might take possession of the cattle, and sell them. These three mortgages were duly recorded on October 18, 1898. Thereafter Gillett sent Kinihan with an order to Naill to deliver him 216 of the cattle covered by these mortgages, and Naill delivered them to Kinihan, and he shipped them to St. Joseph, Missouri, where they were sold, and Gillett got the proceeds of the sale, and appropriated them to his own use. On November 1, 1898, Gillett left the country, and went to Mexico, leaving obligations amounting to over $1,000,000. The holders of the three mortgages of October 14th, deeming themselves insecure by reason of the absconding of Gillett, elected to declare their debts due, and took possession of the cattle, or rather of all the cattle covered by their mortgages except such as Gillett had sent to St. Joseph and sold. Thereupon it developed that the Third National Bank of Springfield, Massachusetts, held the Baumbaugh mortgage of October 4th, which purported to cover all the cattle, and that the State Bank of St. Louis, the First National Bank of Omaha, and the Northwestern National Bank of Chicago held the three separate mortgages executed on October 14th by Gillett to Elmore & Cooper. The parties therefore agreed to consign all the cattle to the plaintiff, and have it sell them, and hold the proceeds until the claimants could settle their conflicting claims. Failing so to do, the plaintiff filed this bill of interpleader as hereinbefore set out.

It is proper to say further that the Baumbaugh mortgage contained no express provision making the mortgage apply to after-acquired cattle, but purported to operate instantly upon the cattle described in the mortgage.

This is a case wherein one of two innocent parties must suffer. The four banks claiming the fund are innocent holders, for value, and without notice. The Springfield bank claims under the Baumbaugh mortgage, while the St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha banks claim under the Gillett mortgage. The Baumbaugh mortgage was executed on October 4, 1898, and recorded on October 6th. The Gillett mortgage was executed October 14th and recorded October 18th. Both mortgages purport to cover the same cattle. The Springfield bank acquired the Baumbaugh mortgage from the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company on October 15th. The Chicago bank acquired the Gillett mortgage held by it on October 20, 1898. The St. Louis bank acquired the Gillett mortgage held by it on October 19, 1898. The Omaha bank acquired the Gillett mortgage held by it on a date not definitely stated. The claim of the Springfield bank 60 L. R. A.

is, therefore, prior in point of time to the claims of the St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha banks. But the decisive question in the case is, Which is prior in right? The Baumbaugh mortgage was executed on October 4th. The effectiveness of that mortgage to bind the property mortgaged is the first question in the case. When this mortgage was made, Baumbaugh did not own a single head of cattle in all the world, so far as the record shows, and had no title whatever to any of the cattle described in the mortgage. Indeed, as far as the 184 head marked T & C are concerned, there were at that time no such cattle in existence. Baumbaugh's title to the cattle described in his mortgage depends entirely upon the bill of sale from Gillett to him. At that time Gillett had no title to a single head of the cattle described in the bill of sale. The 416 head described in the bill of sale as marked J M and circle dot belonged at that time to Clark, and the A. J. Gillespie Commission Company held the mortgage on them for over $15,000, which Clark had given to Elmore & Cooper, and which the Gillespie Company purchased from Elmore & Cooper on October 3d. But Gillett had no title to them whatever. He had an option on them, which required him to pay off the mortgage on them, and to pay the balance of the agreed purchase price of $40 a head to Clark; but at the time he made bill of sale to Baumbaugh Gillett had not paid one cent on account thereof. At his request the Gillespie Company bought the mortgage on October 3d, but that was not Gillett's purchase. No money of his was used for that purchase, and that company carried the note and mortgage as "bills receivable" due that company. The legal title to the property and the possession of the property was in Clark at that time. The bill of sale recites on its face, not an intent to presently deliver possession of the cattle to Baumbaugh, but instead an agreement to deliver such possession thereafter, at a time not specified. At that time the 184 head of T & C cattle were not even in existence, and neither Gillett, when he made the bill of sale, nor Baumbaugh, when he made the mortgage, had any particular cattle in mind as filling this description, but Gillett intended to buy cattle somewhere, and brand them T & C, to fill the call of the bill of sale and mortgage. It is to be noted, however, that no such intention is even hinted at in either the bill of sale or in the mortgage, but, on the contrary, both of those instruments purport to operate instantly upon a subject-matter then assumed to exist. After the note and mortgage were made, Baumbaugh turned them over to Gillett, and Gillett turned them over to the Gillespie company, and on the next day—October 5th—the Gillespie company sold them to the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company. Then, on October 5th, the Gillespie company used part of the proceeds of this sale to pay off the Clark mortgage which it had acquired from Elmore & Cooper, and on the 10th of October it turned over the balance of such proceeds to Gillett, and out of such balance Gillett paid Clark what remained due to him, and then, with the amount remaining of such proceeds, he purchased the 184 head from Thompson, Gangwer, and St. Amand, and marked them T & C. Thus, it will be seen that neither Gillett nor Baumbaugh ever put a cent of their own money in any of these cattle. On the contrary, all of the money that went to pay for the cattle was raised by the Baumbaugh mortgage, and the proceeds of that mortgage arising from a sale thereof to the Hocker, Arnold, Woodson Brokerage Company paid for all the cattle. It must be observed that when the brokerage company took the Baumbaugh mortgage it was informed by the Gillespie company that the mortgagor did not have any such cattle as he was attempting to mortgage. The Springfield bank, however, had no knowledge of this state of affairs.

The sum of the matter therefore, is this: Gillett gave Baumbaugh a bill of sale for cattle he did not own, never paid a cent for, and did not have possession of, and a part of which had no existence, but which he agreed to deliver, and for which Baumbaugh never paid or agreed to pay him a cent. Baumbaugh executed a mortgage on cattle he never paid a cent for, never owned, and never had possession of. Neither the bill of sale nor the mortgage attempts in any way to affect or cover after-acquired property. The question, then, is, What title to the cattle was conveyed by the Baumbaugh mortgage? It is a fundamental rule of the common law that nothing could be mortgaged that was not in existence at the time of the mortgage, and did not at the time belong to the mortgagor. And this rule obtains in nearly all of the states of the Union. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 979, and cases cited in notes. This is the rule in Kansas, where the mortgages in question in this case were made. Long v. Hines, 40 Kan. 220, 19 Pac. 796. In this case the supreme court of Kansas quotes the language of Chief Justice Shaw in Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 294, who said: "A mortgage is an executed contract; a present transfer of title, although conditional and defeasible. It can, therefore, only bind and affect property existing and capable of being identified at the time it is made; and, whatever may be the agreement of the parties, it cannot bind property afterwards to be acquired by the mortgagor." The supreme court of Kansas, however, pointed out that in Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612, it was said: "The next question is with reference to the rights of the parties to the property acquired by Patterson after the execution of all the mortgages. Of course, this property was not included in the mortgages at the time of their execution. In fact, it could not have been included in the mortgages at that time, for it is not within the power of any person to mortgage property which does not exist, or which does not belong to him. He cannot mortgage property which is afterwards to be created, or purchased, or procured. He can only mortgage property which at the time is in existence, and to 60 L. R. A.

which he has a title. Parties may make contracts with reference to future-acquired property, and contracts which will be legal and valid and will be upheld; but such contracts do not constitute chattel mortgages. They are simply executory contracts, to be performed in the future; and, while they are binding upon the parties making them, they are void as to third persons who have no notice respecting them. They can never be treated as chattel mortgages affecting third persons. Such contracts, however, are always held valid, as though they were chattel mortgages, as against third persons who have not in the meantime obtained any specific interest in the property when the mortgagee has obtained the possession of the property under the contracts. . . . When a mortgagee takes possession of the future-acquired property under such a stipulation in the mortgage, he then holds the property by way of pledge, but in the same manner as though the mortgage had been executed at the time he takes the possession of the property, and in the same manner as though he had taken the property under and by virtue of a chattel mortgage covering the property." The rule in Kansas is that, to affect the after-acquired property, the mortgage must contain an express provision binding such after-acquired property; and, even where there is such an express provision in the mortgage, the rights of third persons are not affected thereby unless the mortgagee takes actual possession of the after-acquired property before it is purchased by third persons, or seized by creditors, and that, if such third persons purchase it, or such creditors seize it, before the mortgagee takes such actual possession thereof, the third persons or creditors obtain the better right thereto. Dayton v. People's Sav. Bank, 23 Kan. 421; Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612; George R. Barse Live Stock & Commission Co. v. Guthrie, 50 Kan., loc. cit. 474, 475, 31 Pac. 1071.

The case of John S. Brittain Dry Goods Co. v. Blanchard, 60 Kan. 263, 56 Pac. 474, is relied on by the Springfield bank as an analogous case to the case at bar, but this is a misapprehension. In that case it appeared that one Foltz was indebted to the plaintiff, the Brittain Dry Goods Company. The debt was unsecured. Foltz desired to buy a herd of cattle. He obtained the money so to do from the defendants, Blanchard et al., agreeing to buy the cattle, take them to his farm, and to secure Blanchard by giving a bill of sale of the cattle to a man in his (Foltz's) employ, and have the man execute the notes and mortgage. This scheme was resorted to because Foltz was president of a bank, and it was feared it would injure the credit of the bank if Foltz executed the mortgage. The arrangement was carried out literally, except Foltz did not give the bill of sale to his employee, who executed the note and mortgage to Blanchard. The plaintiff attached the cattle, and claimed that the mortgage was fraudulent. It was held to be a good mortgage. But it is readily seen that that case is wholly unlike the case at bar. The following essential differences exist between that case and the case at bar: First. There Foltz owned the cattle and was in possession of the cattle at the time the mortgage was executed, whereas here Baumbaugh never owned the cattle and never was in possession of the cattle at any time; and, even if the mortgage here be regarded as the mortgage of Gillett, and not of Baumbaugh, still this case is unlike that case, because Gillett did not own the cattle when the mortgage was given, nor was he in possession of any such cattle at that time, and as to 184 of them they were not even in existence at the time the mortgage was executed. Second. There Foltz had title to the property, which he could convey by the bill of sale or by the mortgage executed by him in the name of and through his employee, whereas here Gillett had no such title. Third. There the property was all the time in Foltz's possession, whereas here the property was not in Gillett's possession until several days after the Baumbaugh mortgage was executed. Fourth. There there was no question as to after-acquired property, but the property was in existence when the mortgage was executed, and could attach at once, whereas no such conditions exist here. Fifth. There the mortgage was attacked as fraudulent, whereas here the question is one of the effectiveness of the Baumbaugh mortgage and the priority of the several mortgages. In addition to this, the supreme court of Kansas gave no intimation in that case of intention to overrule the doctrine that had been established in the cases cited from that jurisdiction which bear upon the questions here involved. In fact, the Brittain-Blanchard Case was treated as being so different from the other cases cited herein that those cases were not even referred to.

The case of Alexander Bros. v. Graves, 25 Neb. 453, 41 N. W. 290, is also strongly relied on by the Springfield bank. In that case A purchased a team of horses from B, and executed a chattel mortgage on the team to secure the purchase price. The parties to the transaction were unacquainted, and B supposed that A had given his true name. Subsequently, A sold the team in his real name to C, who examined the records, and found no mortgage on the team executed in A's name. B replevied the team from C, and recovered judgment. But it will be observed that this case is not like the case at bar in this important particular, to wit, at the time A executed the mortgage he was the owner and in possession of the property mortgaged, and such property was then in esse, whereas such is not the case here either as to Baumbaugh or Gillett. It is, of course, conceded that an owner in possession of personal property may execute a valid mortgage in a fictitious name, or may procure a valid mortgage to be executed thereon by some one acting in the name of the other, but in reality for the true owner, and such a mortgage is perfectly good as between the mortgagor and the mortgagee. But it is not so clear, notwithstanding the decision cited, that such a mortgage will prevail over a mortgage executed in the real name of the owner in favor of another third person, who examined the records, and found no mortgage recorded by the true owner on the property. It is stated in the opinion cited that no precedent had been found for it. The weight of authority is that a mortgage on personal property made by one who is not the owner of the property, or by the owner in a fictitious name, and placed on record, is not constructive notice to any one dealing with the owner in his true name. The reason of the rule is that such conveyances in fictitious names or in the name of an agent lie outside of the chain of title, and therefore impart no notice. This is the rule always as to real property. Crockett v. Maguire, 10 Mo. 34; Digman v. McCollum, 47 Mo. 372; Tydings v. Pitcher, 82 Mo. loc. cit. 384. And, so far as mortgages are concerned, the same rule must obtain as to chattels, if any efficacy is to be given to our registry acts. This is the doctrine that prevails elsewhere. Maier v. Davis, 57 Wis. 212, 15 N. W. 187; Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426, 48 N. W. 520 (directly in point); Lewis v. Buttrick, 102 Mass. 412; Wade, Notice, §§ 205, 223. Devlin, Deeds, 2d ed. § 712, quotes approvingly the language of Duncan, J., in Keller v. Nutz, 5 Serg. & R. 246, who said: "If conveyances from one stranger to another would be notice to all the world, miserable would be the situation of the purchaser. The registering act would afford him no protection, because it would give him no notice." And in § 713 the same author points out that the record is notice only to purchasers under the same grantor. 2 Cobby, Chat. Mortg. § 781, discusses the cases of Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426, 48 N. W. 520, and Alexander Bros. v. Graves, 25 Neb. 453, 41 N. W. 290, hereinbefore referred to, and says the Wisconsin case rests upon the better reason, and the author lays down the rule that a mortgage under a fictitious name is void as to third parties dealing with the mortgagor by his true name. Id. § 781. In the case of The Mary, 1 Paine, 671, Fed. Cas. No. 9,187, it was held that, if the owner of a vessel, after having given a bill of sale in the nature of a mortgage, be allowed to remain in possession, and act as absolute owner, without any change of her register, and he afterwards sells or mortgages the vessel or gives a bottomry bond to one who has no notice of the mortgage, the lien of the latter will prevail over the first mortgage.

In this case, therefore, the result is the same whether the mortgage under which the Springfield bank claims be treated as the mortgage of Baumbaugh or that of Gillett acting in the name of Baumbaugh. In either aspect of the case that mortgage was outside of the chain of title under which the St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha banks claim title; and, the Springfield mortgage not being made in the name of Gillett, it imparted no notice to Elmore & Cooper when they took the other three mortgages from Gillett. They found Gillett in possession of the cattle. They were not obliged to look for mortgages on Gillett's interest in the cattle in any fictitious name, nor in the name of any one for Gillett. No mortgages on the cattle appeared in Gillett's name. Elmore & Cooper were required to inquire no further.

It has already been pointed out that at the time Baumbaugh executed the mortgage now held by the Springfield bank neither Baumbaugh nor Gillett owned the cattle or was in possession thereof, and that the bill of sale and mortgage dealt with the cattle as in presenti and as in esse, and did not attempt to expressly bind any after-acquired cattle. As between the mortgagor and the mortgagee, or Gillett and the mortgagee, the mortgage was sufficient to convey any title they then had, and also such as they might afterwards acquire. But as between the mortgagee and subsequent mortgagees, purchasers, or attaching creditors, that mortgage was not sufficient to cover after-acquired cattle, and, as the cattle in this case were all after-acquired cattle by Gillett (never at any time by Baumbaugh), the mortgage executed by Baumbaugh was not sufficient to bind the cattle as against the claims of the St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha banks under the mortgage executed by Gillett to Elmore & Cooper on October 14, 1898. And, even if the Baumbaugh mortgage had contained an express provision making it apply to after-acquired property, it would not avail the Springfield bank anything in this case, because that bank did not take actual possession of the cattle before they were seized and taken into possession by the holders of the Gillett mortgage of October 14th, now and at that time held by the Chicago, St. Louis, and Omaha banks. Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612; Long v. Hines, 40 Kan. 220, 19 Pac. 796; Rochester Distilling Co. v. Rasey, 142 N. Y. 570, 37 N. E. 632; Low v. Pew, 108 Mass. 347, 11 Am. Rep. 357; Tapfield v. Hillman, 6 Mann. & G. 245; Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 181; Montgomery v. Chase, 30 Minn. 132, 14 N. W. 586; Penock v. Coe, 23 How. 117, 16 L. ed. 436; Tiffany, Sales, ed. 1895, 24; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 916. Jones, Chat. Mortg. 2d ed. § 138, says: "At common law a mortgage can operate only on property actually in existence at the time of giving the mortgage, and then actually belonging to the mortgagor, or potentially belonging to him as an incident of other property then in existence, and belonging to him. A mortgage of goods which the mortgagor does not own at the time of making the mortgage, though he may afterwards acquire them, is void, in respect to such goods as against subsequent purchasers or attaching creditors." And in 60 L. R. A.

speaking of a right to mortgage a potential interest, the author, in § 140, says: "Thus, to use illustrations familiar since the time of Chief Justice Hobart: 'Land is the mother and root of all fruits. Therefore he that hath it may grant all fruits that may arise upon it after, and the property shall pass as soon as the fruits are extant. A person may grant all the tithe wool that he may have in such a year, yet perhaps he shall have none; but a man cannot grant all the wool that he shall grow upon his sheep that he shall buy hereafter, for there he hath it neither actually nor potentially.'"

It follows that the Baumbaugh mortgage was void as to third persons, subsequent purchasers, mortgagees, and creditors, because neither Baumbaugh nor Gillett owned any of the cattle covered by it when it was executed, nor were they apparent owners in possession, nor had they any potential interest therein. It also follows that, while such mortgage was sufficient as between them and the mortgagee to cover after-acquired cattle, it was not sufficient to bind such after-acquired property as against the subsequent mortgagees, the St. Louis, Chicago, and Omaha banks. And this is true both because the Baumbaugh mortgage did not in express terms apply to after-acquired property, and because the mortgagee therein did not take actual possession of such after-acquired property before the liens and rights of the subsequent mortgage attached.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to consider the other questions raised. The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the interpleaders the Northwestern National Bank of Chicago, the State Bank of St. Louis, and the First National Bank of Omaha, each for the portion of the fund arising from the sale of the part of the cattle covered by its mortgage, if such proceeds can be followed into the fund and be distinguishable from the balance of the fund, and, if this cannot be done, then to enter a decree dividing the fund among these three banks in the proportion that their respective claims bear to the total fund; and to enter a decree against Charles H. Baumbaugh for all costs, with a proviso that, if they cannot be made out of him, then against each interpleader for the costs incurred by each.

All concur.

Petition for rehearing denied December 24, 1902.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

George H. EARLE, Jr., Receiver of Chestnut Street National Bank, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Susan CARSON.

(46 C. C. A. 498, 107 Fed. 639.)

A holder of stock in a national bank who, without knowledge or suspicion that the bank is either then insolvent or is likely to prove so, sells the stock, and who does everything reasonably possible to procure a transfer of the shares on the books of the bank, cannot be held liable as a stockholder, although the bank is declared insolvent before the transfer is effected, and both the bank and the purchaser were insolvent when the sale was made.

(March 12, 1901.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce the double liability of an alleged shareholder in an insolvent national bank. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The general knowledge, which every intelligent shareholder has, that the law imposes upon the national bank stockholders a double liability, will not render a sale of his shares fraudulent as to creditors when made in good faith, the seller having no knowledge or suspicion that the bank of which he is a shareholder is embarrassed or likely to become insolvent.

J. B. McPherson, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought by the receiver of an insolvent national bank to enforce the double liability of a shareholder. The bank was closed and the receiver was appointed on December 23, 1897, and upon that day the name of the defendant appeared upon the official list of shareholders as the owner of 10 shares of the capital stock. Prima facie, therefore, she was liable for the assessment that was afterwards levied by the comptroller of the currency; but she met this apparent liability (successfully, as the verdict shows) by offering evidence at the trial to prove that on December 2d she had sold her shares in good faith, without knowledge or suspicion that the bank was either then insolvent, or was likely to prove insolvent, and that she had done everything that was reasonably possible to procure a transfer of the shares on the books of the bank to the purchaser. Under several decisions of the Federal courts, if the evidence established these facts, a complete defense was presented to the receiver's claim. Whitney v. Butler, 118 U. S. 655, 30 L. ed. 266, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 61; Richmond v. Irons, 121 U. S. 27, 30 L. ed. 864, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 788; Earle v. Coyle, 38 C. C. A. 226, 97 Fed. 410; Matteson v. Dent, 176 U. S. 521, 44 L. ed. 571, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 419. Recognizing the probability that the defense would be successful, the receiver attempted to reply to it by offering to prove in rebuttal that the bank was insolvent on December 2d as well as on December 23d, and that the purchaser of the shares was also insolvent at the time the sale was made to him. This evidence was objected to as immaterial, unless the receiver should offer to follow it by proof that the defendant had knowledge of the insolvency of the bank and of the insolvency of the purchaser; and, as the receiver was unable thus to follow the offer, the learned judge excluded the testimony. It should be noted that neither in the court below nor in this court was it contended that the evidence was offered upon the question of the defendant's good faith. Her ignorance of the insolvency and her good faith were conceded, and the receiver's purpose was merely to raise the question that is immediately to be stated and considered. Manifestly, if the evidence had been offered to affect the defendant's good faith, it would have been insufficient, without other evidence from which her knowledge of the bank's insolvency might fairly be inferred.

It is the exclusion of this rebuttal testimony that is complained of under the only assignments of error that need be discussed. The question presented is this: In what sense does the double liability of a shareholder in a national bank become fixed when the bank becomes insolvent in fact? Is it either fixed absolutely, so that no transfer, in good faith or otherwise, to any purchaser whatever, can afterwards be made that will relieve the shareholder? Or is it so far fixed that no valid transfer can be made, even in good faith, if the purchaser be insolvent? The plaintiff in error has referred us to cases decided in several states under their respective constitutions and statutes that seem to support his contention concerning the nature and time of maturity of a shareholder's liability. These decisions hold that the liability is fixed, either absolutely or sub modo, by the fact of insolvency; but we do not discuss them, because the national banking act and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have established a different rule in respect to shares in a national banking association. Section 5139, Rev. Stat., provides that such shares shall be transferred on the books of the bank as the by-laws may prescribe, and that "every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer shall, in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder of such shares." This provision has been so enlarged by the decisions already cited that a shareholder is enabled to rid himself of his rights and liabilities by less than a transfer in fact. He will satisfy this section if he is able to prove that he sold in good faith, and that he did everything that was reasonably possible to procure the proper formal transfer on the books of the association. There is no restriction in the banking act forbidding transfer after the bank has become insolvent, or forbidding transfer to an insolvent person at any time; and, if these restrictions on the right to sell are to be enforced, it is because they are imposed by the courts in obedience to considerations of public policy, or in accordance with the general principles of justice and fair dealing that are applied to test any given transaction, although no statute may have enacted these principles as rules of decision.

What answer, then, do the principles of justice and fair dealing lead us to give to the question now before the court? We think the answer should be this: As Congress has imposed no restriction on the right to sell, and as the duty to transfer has been held to be fulfilled by a proper, even if an unsuccessful, effort to transfer, the seller is bound simply to diligence, fairness, and good faith in the transaction. He is not bound at his peril to know that the bank is insolvent, or that the proposed purchaser of his shares is insolvent. He is bound to take notice of any fact that may reasonably put him on inquiry concerning the insolvency of the bank or of the purchaser, and to use diligently the means of knowledge at his disposal. If he knows, or has reasonable ground to believe, that the bank is insolvent, it would be a fraud if, with intent to evade his own liability, he should sell his shares, even to a solvent person; and both the receiver of the bank and the purchaser would find a court of equity ready to afford them proper redress. So, also, if with similar knowledge of the bank's insolvency, or with reasonable ground for belief, a shareholder should sell to a person whom he knew to be insolvent, this would be presumably misconduct of the same nature. Such a sale could rarely withstand attack by, or on behalf of, the persons injured; for the apparent inference of intent to evade the statutory liability would almost inevitably be drawn. But why should the unknown fact that the bank is insolvent destroy the statutory right of transfer, if the transfer is made in good faith? In our opinion, no principle of justice or fair dealing forbids such transfer, for by the very assumption the transfer is bona fide, and in ignorance of the bank's insolvency; and the seller is therefore seeking no unfair personal advantage, but is merely exercising innocently an apparent statutory right.

Neither, as we think, is the transfer under such circumstances forbidden by public policy. In the case of a transfer to a solvent purchaser, no consideration for the creditors of the bank demands that the sale be forbidden; for between two solvent persons it is of no importance to the creditors upon which person the assessment may be levied. If the transfer be made to an insolvent person, then, although the transaction may be in good faith, no doubt the creditors of the bank are injured; but, if it is sought to prevent the possibility of doing such an injury by a ruling that such transfers are invalid,—and such a ruling must rest upon the ground of public policy, and not upon the ground that the ignorant and innocent shareholder has violated any principle of justice or fair dealing,—we think it would be very difficult to apply the rule of policy consistently. The reason for such a decision could only be that, as the bank's creditors have, by the mere fact of the bank's insolvency, become entitled to enforce the double liability, a shareholder ought not to be allowed, even by an act done ignorantly and in good faith, to render a part of the creditors' security unavailable by a transfer to an insolvent person. We see no other ground on which the ruling could be sustained, and this ground seems to us unsatisfactory for the following reasons: First. The reason being that harm to the creditors should be prevented, an irresponsible shareholder ought to be permitted to transfer to another irresponsible person; for, in that event, the creditors would suffer no harm, and no reason would exist for restricting the statutory right to sell at will. Second. The reason, if sufficient, ought logically to be extended so as to strike down transfers to insolvent persons made while the bank was solvent, as well as to be applied to transfers made after it had become insolvent; for the same harm is done to creditors in the one case as in the other, and in both cases a withdrawal of the statutory security ought, upon the assumption, to be prevented. Third. The rule would, or at least might, involve inquiry into the sol-veny of three persons,—the seller, the purchaser, and the bank; and the inconvenience of such an inquiry in each of many possible suits is entitled to weight in determining the applicability of the rule. Fourth. In every litigated case the question of the bank's solvency, at least at a particular date before its doors were closed, would be in issue; and, as this question is one of fact for the determination of a jury, it is readily conceivable that, either because the amount of evidence was not the same in every case, or because different juries were disposed to take different views of the same facts, there would be conflicting verdicts concerning the bank's solvency at substantially the same instant of time. Fifth. To apply such a rule would, in the language of defendant's counsel, "introduce into all transactions an element of uncertainty; for every transaction would be subject to review, even though made in good faith, if it subsequently proved that at the date when the transfer was made the bank, if then liquidated, would have proved insolvent, and that the transferee, if called upon to pay at that day all his debts, would have been unable to respond."

To our minds, these are reasons enough for hesitating to adopt the rule that has been urged upon us. It has no authority to support it, if we except a dictum in Stuart v. Hayden, 169 U. S. 1, 42 L. ed. 639, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 274. In that case the principal point decided was that a fraudulent transfer of shares, made after the seller knew of the bank's insolvency, and made also for the very purpose of evading the statutory liability, was invalid against the creditors of the bank; and that the receiver could pursue the seller as if the attempted sale had not been made. The learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court, after discussing and deciding this point, went on to say: "If the bank be solvent at the time of the transfer,—that is, able to meet its existing contracts, debts, and engagements,—the motive with which the transfer is made is, of course, immaterial. But, if the bank be insolvent, the receiver may, at least, without suing the transferee and litigating the question of his liability, look to those shareholders who, knowing or having reason to know at the time that the bank was insolvent, got rid of their stock in order to escape the individual liability to which the statute subjected them. Whether—the bank being in fact insolvent—the transfer is liable to be treated as a shareholder in respect of its existing contracts, debts, and engagements, if he believed in good faith at the time of transfer that the bank was solvent, is a question which, in the view we take of the present case, need not be discussed; although he may be so treated, even when acting in good faith, if the transfer is to one who is financially irresponsible."

It is upon the italicized clause of this quotation that the plaintiff in error relies; but we think the clause is so obviously a remark by the way that it cannot possibly be taken as a serious decision of a point which in the same breath the learned justice says "need not be discussed." It may also be true that the language is to be understood in the sense suggested by the brief of defendant's counsel. The suggestion is, in substance, this: The clause merely means that the seller may be treated as still a shareholder, if the transfer is to a person who is financially irresponsible; that is to say, from such a transfer the inference may be drawn, having due regard to the facts of the particular case, that the transaction was intended to be evasive, and in that event the seller will continue to be a shareholder even if he made a transfer out and out, with no secret arrangement that he was at some future time, or in some future contingency, to have the stock again, or to enjoy its profits, — in other words, even if he made such a transfer as the English cases speak of as a transfer in good faith, the good faith consisting in the fact that the transfer is absolute, and without reservation. Whether this suggestion be correct, we have no means of knowing. The language of the court, however, is certainly a dictum; and if it means what the plaintiff in error declares it to mean, with great respect we must decline to follow it.

There is no need to discuss the assignments of error in detail. They present nothing that calls for further attention.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

William CLEGHORN, Appt.,
v.

WESTERN RAILWAY OF ALABAMA.

(184 Ala. 601.)

Erecting in or beside a highway a crane for delivering mail to passing trains, which, when the mail bag is strung upon it, is calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, is negligence which will render the railroad company liable to one who, in the exercise of ordinary care, is injured by the frightening thereby of the horse which he is driving, although the bag is actually placed in position by government employees.

(November 18, 1902.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Macon County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Plaintiff was driving a mule, hitched to a one-horse wagon, across defendant's railway, when the mule became frightened at a mail crane from which was suspended a mail bag, and started, violently throwing plaintiff into a ditch near the crossing, into which mule and wagon fell immediately afterward, striking plaintiff and seriously injuring him.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Oscar S. Lewis for appellant.

Mr. George P. Harrison, for appellee:

The alleged act of the defendant, even if negligent, was not the proximate cause of the injury. Between it and the injury intervened the act of the United States government in placing the mail bag upon the crane.

McClellan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mail cranes at flag stations are necessary to the business of railway companies carrying the mails, but it cannot be said to be necessary for such companies to erect such cranes in or so near to public roads crossing their tracks as that the cranes or their use would obstruct the use of highways by the public. To the contrary, in such erections, as well as all others, railways must have due regard to the rights of the public in adjacent highways; and if, failing in such regard, a crane is erected in or so near to a public road that a traveler, without contributing fault on his part, sustains injuries by reason of its location, the railway is liable to him in damages, as it would be for any other unnecessary and wrongful obstruction of the highway. If it may be said that a mail crane is in itself a structure of such ungainly, not to say hideous, mien as to be calculated to frighten a horse of ordinary gentleness, and one is erected immediately upon the side of a public road, and such a horse, in being driven by, becomes frightened and unmanageable, and hurts his driver, the latter has his action on the case against the railway company. But suppose such crane, so located, in and of its naked self is not calculated to frighten gentle horses, but becomes an object of terror to them—a scarecrow, or, more accurately, a scarehorse—when a mail bag is suspended upon it, and in conjunction with such bag, and that while the crane is thus being put to its intended uses a horse of ordinary gentleness is driven along the road, and becomes frightened at the crane and its burden, and runs away, or springs aside or backs into a ditch, and hurts the driver,—in such case can the driver recover against the railway company as upon negligence for erecting and having the crane so near to the highway, contemplating and intending this terrifying use of it? In determining this question, it is to be assumed and borne in mind that damages are not claimed for the act of putting the bag on the crane, and that the bag is in fact strung onto the crane, not by the railway, but presumably by an employee of the postal service. But it is also not to be lost sight of that it is the railway company whose business it is to get that bag at that station and carry it forward; that the postal department of the government is not concerned as to how the carrier gets the bag, but only that the bag is got by it and carried; that the crane is erected by the company to facilitate the accomplishment of a duty and obligation resting on it; and that the government puts the bag on the crane to the end that the railway company may discharge its duty with the greatest ease to itself, by taking the bag on without stopping its train. The question thus presented is one of some nicety and difficulty. It is, moreover, res integra, so far as we are advised. Our opinion upon it, however, is that the railway company would be liable. By the erection of the crane for its own purpose of having mail bags strung upon it, the company assumes responsibility for injuries resulting from the structure while and in consequence of its being in the use intended, if it has been guilty of negligence in erecting the crane too near a public road, and the crane, with its burden, is an object calculated to frighten gentle horses. In such case the negligent erection of the crane, in the contemplation and with the intention that it shall be used by others for the benefit of the company in a way which is calculated to frighten domestic animals and cause them to injure their owners, is the efficient and proximate cause of an injury resulting from the position and intended use of the crane. Having in mind the purposes of the erection, and the fact that it will inevitably be put to the intended uses, there is, we think, an unbroken chain of causation from the erection of the crane at the side of a highway, and the fright of a passing horse, produced by the presence there of the crane, with the mail bag upon it. The complaint in this case makes a case, under these views of the law, and the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to it. We may not be impressed with the notion that such a structure, with a mail bag on it, is calculated to disturb the equanimity and frighten a horse of ordinary gentleness; but it is alleged to be in this complaint, and that question is one for the jury.

The judgment for the defendant must be reversed, as also the judgment sustaining the demurrer to the complaint as amended. A judgment will be here entered overruling the demurrer and remanding the cause.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Resp't.,
v.

James BURNS, Appt.

(.....Cal.....)

1. An assault with intent to commit a robbery may be prosecuted as an attempt to commit robbery.
2. A statute making the penalty of an attempt one half that prescribed for the commission of the offense is void for uncertainty in cases where the penalty for the offense is imprisonment for life.

On Rehearing.

3. The offense of attempt to commit robbery is created by a statute providing that every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, is punishable.

NOTE.—As to effect of uncertainty of a sentence upon its validity, see, in this series, Howard v. United States (C. C. App. 6th C.) 34 L. R. A. 509, and Murphy v. Com. (Mass.) 43 L. R. A. 154.

4. Under statutes fixing the punishment for robbery at imprisonment for not less than one year, and permitting the court, in its discretion, to sentence the offender to imprisonment during his natural life, and making the punishment for an attempt, imprisonment for a term not exceeding one half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon conviction of the offense so attempted,—an attempt to commit robbery may be punished by imprisonment for a definite term of years.

5. Conviction of attempt to commit robbery after conviction of prior crimes punishable by imprisonment in the state prison does not require imposition of punishment under a statute providing for life imprisonment after such conviction of one guilty of a crime which upon a first conviction would be punishable, at the discretion of the court, by imprisonment for life, although one convicted of robbery under such circumstances would be within the terms of such statute, where there was no discretion to punish one guilty of an attempt to commit robbery by imprisonment for life.

(May 29, 1902.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco convicting him of an attempt to commit robbery. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Abraham Ruef and Fabius T. Finch for appellant.

Messrs. Tiley L. Ford, Attorney General, and A. A. Moore, Jr., for respondent:

All assaults to commit felonies can be prosecuted as attempts.

People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880; People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 17 L. R. A. 626, 30 Pac. 800.

The information charged the crime of robbery, committed both by force and fear; and where the statute enumerates several acts disjunctively, which separately or together shall constitute an offense, the indictment may charge one or both of them, provided, if it charges both, it does so conjunctively.

People v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 1, 62 Pac. 297; People v. Thompson, 111 Cal. 243, 43 Pac. 748.

The jury in the case at bar had a right to find the defendant guilty of robbery, or attempt to commit robbery.

People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880; People v. Vann, 129 Cal. 118, 61 Pac. 776; People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 17 L. R. A. 626, 30 Pac. 800; People v. Barnhart, 59 Cal. 381.

In view of the fact that the defendant could well have been convicted of robbery, his substantial rights were not injuriously affected, to the extent to warrant interference at this time.

People v. Muhlnher, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128; People v. Maroney, 109 Cal. 277, 41 Pac. 1097; People v. Lowen, 109 Cal. 381, 42 Pac. 32; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452.

The sentence was proper.

Mr. Lewis F. Byington also for respondent.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant has been convicted of the crime of attempt to commit robbery. He also pleaded guilty to certain prior convictions charged against him in the information.

It is first claimed that there is no such crime in this state as "attempt to commit robbery," but there is nothing in this contention. The Penal Code declares (§ 664): "Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable." etc. It is here insisted that defendant, if guilty under the evidence, should have been convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit robbery. Yet this claim is made in the face of the fact that the court, in People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, has declared "that all assaults to commit felonies can be prosecuted as attempts." This proposition would seem to be self-evident, for the single difference made by the statute between an assault and an attempt is that in the former there is an additional element of present ability. Necessarily, every assault includes an attempt. This question has been considered at some length in People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 17 L. R. A. 626, 30 Pac. 800, and the court now repeats what is there said: "It is not the purpose of the court to draw nice distinctions between an attempt to commit an offense and an assault with intent to commit the offense, for such distinctions could only have the effect to favor the escape of criminals from their just deservings. And in view of the fact that all assaults to commit felonies can be prosecuted as attempts, we can see no objection in carrying the discussion of the subject to any greater lengths."

It is next insisted that the penalty provided by the statute to be enforced against a defendant convicted of an attempt to commit robbery, prior convictions having been charged and proved against him, is absolutely void, as being too vague and indefinite to be enforced by the courts. And this contention presents the important question in the case. By virtue of the provisions of the Penal Code found in §§ 213, 664, and 667, if this defendant had been convicted of robbery, then his conviction, in conjunction with the prior convictions charged and proved against him, would have demanded that the court fix his punishment at imprisonment for life. In such a case there would be no range for the exercise of discretion. The penalty would be life imprisonment, no more and no less. This appears in the record to be conceded by the trial judge, the attorney general, and counsel for defendant. Such being the condition of the law, it is then conceded by counsel upon both sides that the punishment for an attempt to commit robbery, coupled with prior convictions, must necessarily be one half of the penalty provided by the law upon a conviction for robbery, coupled with prior convictions, that is, one half of life. Now, the learned judge of the trial court, by reason of this anomalous condition of the law, was at once surrounded by serious difficulties when the time arrived to render judgment, for that judgment had to be one covering one half of the period of defendant's life; and, while death is said to be certain, life, upon the contrary, is most uncertain. The trial court, by reason of the peculiar state of the law, and for the purpose of determining the prospective life of defendant, consulted certain mortality tables used by life insurance companies in the conduct of their business, and, taking into consideration defendant's present age (his sound physical condition being an admitted fact), concluded that the remainder of his natural life would amount to thirty-eight years, and thereupon sentenced him to nineteen years in the state prison. This court is well satisfied that the practice here followed cannot be sanctioned. The trial court fixed the penalty upon the basis of an average life, and sentenced him to imprisonment for one half of the period of an average life; yet the law declares the imprisonment should be for a period of one half of the defendant's life. These mortality tables indicate averages, and that fact alone proves that a variable proportion of the men coming within any particular class die before the age fixed as the average, and the remainder die after the age so fixed. As to the particular period of time covering the balance of defendant's life, the court knew nothing, and, in the nature of things, could know nothing. Hence the period of nineteen years fixed as a penalty is based upon mere conjecture, and the judgment following it cannot be upheld. It is evident that the penalty prescribed by the law, namely, one half of life, as a punishment for a crime of the class here involved, is so vague and indefinite as to be impossible of enforcement; and the statute providing a penalty of that kind is void for that reason. The case of People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, is not authority for the prosecution in this case, for in that case a judgment of life imprisonment, in terms, for the crime of rape, was not the only penalty that could have been adjudged against the defendant. Here it is conceded to the contrary. The confusion in the law in this class of cases arises largely by reason of the provisions of § 671 of the Penal Code, which authorize in certain classes of felony—as, for example, robbery—a penalty in terms of life imprisonment. That section, when considered in connection with the provisions of the Code bearing upon penalties therein provided in cases of attempts to commit felonies, coupled with prior convictions, leaves the law in this respect clothed in the garb of an intricate Chinese puzzle.

It becomes unnecessary to consider the remaining questions raised upon this appeal. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: Harrison, J.; Van Dyke, J.

A rehearing in banc having been granted, and the cause reargued, McFarland, J., on December 23, 1902, delivered the opinion of the court in response thereto:

The defendant was charged in the information with the crime of robbery, and the verdict was, "Guilty of an attempt to commit robbery." The information also charged two prior convictions,—one of petit larceny, and the other of a felony. The defendant pleaded "Not guilty" to the charge set out in the information, and admitted the prior convictions. The judgment was imprisonment in the state prison for a term of nineteen years, and defendant appealed.

peals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

We do not find in the record any valid reason for reversing the order denying a new trial.

The contention of appellant that there is no such crime in this state as an attempt to commit robbery is not maintainable. It was held otherwise in People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 17 L. R. A. 626, 30 Pac. 800, and People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880. Section 664 of the Penal Code clearly creates such crime.

Instruction 33, upon the subject of reasonable doubt and moral certainty, to which appellant objects, is substantially the same as the instruction on that subject reviewed by this court in the recent case of People v. Huntington, 70 Pac. 284, and it was held in the latter case that the giving of such instruction was not a ground for reversal.

There is a part of Instruction 17 which at first blush gives some plausibility to appellant's objection to it. Appellant contends that by this instruction the jury was substantially told that they could not convict him of only a simple assault unless it appeared beyond a reasonable doubt that such assault had not been made with a felonious intent to commit robbery or grand larceny. Of course, such an instruction would have been erroneous. But this is clearly not the meaning of the instruction as given. It merely tells the jury that a verdict of guilty of a simple assault would be a finding that such assault had been shown beyond a reasonable doubt, and that—as the instruction proceeds—"it had not been shown to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt either that such assault had been made in conjunction with a specific felonious intent to commit either robbery or grand larceny, as herein defined, or that a felonious attempt had been made to commit either of those offenses, as herein defined." Taking the instruction as a whole, it is clear that the jury could not have been misled by it.

The general contention that the charge of the court was so much in the nature of an argument against the appellant as to call for a reversal cannot, we think, be maintained. There are no other points arising on the appeal from the order denying the new trial which call for special notice.

We think, however, that the judgment was rendered upon a wrong theory, under which the court below felt compelled to sentence appellant to a longer term of imprisonment than, as appears in the record, it otherwise would have done; and it would therefore be unjust to allow the judgment to stand. After the return of the verdict the court announced its conclusion that the only punishment that could be inflicted upon appellant was imprisonment in the state prison for one half of his natural life; and thereupon, under objection and exception of appellant, it was shown that under the American Tables of Mortality the expectation of life of appellant was thirty-eight years, and judgment was rendered for the exact half of that time, to wit, nineteen years. We are satisfied that, for obvious reasons, a court, for the purpose of a judgment of imprisonment in a criminal case, cannot take as a basis for such judgment the expectation of life upon which insurance companies calculate their policies, and which is founded on what vital statistics show to be the average expectation. What the actual life of a particular person would be, and what would be the half of it, cannot be known; and, if one half of the life of the appellant were the only punishment prescribed for the crime of which he was convicted, such punishment would be too vague and indefinite to be possible of enforcement, and no judgment could be rendered against him, but we think that under the decision in People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, the appellant is punishable for a definite period of years. Penal Code, § 213, provides that "robbery is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one year;" and by § 671 the court in such case "may, in its discretion, sentence such offender to imprisonment during his natural life." Section 664 provides that a person who attempts to commit a crime, but fails, is punishable as follows: "(1) If the offense so attempted is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or more, or by imprisonment in a county jail, the person guilty of such attempt is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or in a county jail, as the case may be, for a term not exceeding one half the longest term of imprisonment prescribed upon a conviction of the offense so attempted." In People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, the appellant had been convicted of an attempt to commit rape, and rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than five years, so that the same law applies to an attempt to commit rape as to an attempt to commit robbery. In the Gardner Case the appellant had been sentenced to five years, and it was contended that, imprisonment for life being the "longest term" prescribed as punishment for the completed crime of rape, an attempt to commit that crime must be punished, if at all, for one half of life, which being impossible of calculation, there was no punishment prescribed for such offense, and no judgment whatever could be rendered. But the court said: "This reasoning is ingenious, but not sound," and held that a defendant in such case could be legally sentenced for a definite term of years. No doubt, the question is fairly a debatable one; but, after a careful consideration of the subject, we see no convincing reason for overruling People v. Gardner, and adhere to the rule declared in that case.

It is argued by appellant—and it seems to have been so considered by the court—that § 667 of the Penal Code determines his view to be correct, but that section has no applicability to the case at bar. It provides as follows: "Every person who, having been convicted of petit larceny, or of an attempt to commit an offense which, if perpetrated, would be punished by imprisonment in the state prison, commits a crime after such conviction, is punishable as follows: (1) If the subsequent offense is such that, upon a first conviction, the offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the court, such person is punishable by imprisonment in such prison during life." Now, in the case at bar the "subsequent offense" was only an attempt to commit robbery, and was not, therefore, an offense which upon a first conviction "would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the court." Said subdivision 1 of this section applies only to a case where the "subsequent conviction" is for the completed crime of robbery or rape, or some other offense for a conviction of which, in the absence of any prior conviction, the court, in its discretion, might impose a life imprisonment; and in such case only is the discretion of the court taken away, and the penalty of life imprisonment absolutely prescribed. With respect to the matter of a prior conviction, which frequently causes embarrassing questions, the case at bar is governed by § 666, Penal Code, which provides as follows: "Every person who, having been convicted of any offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, commits any crime after such conviction, is punishable therefor as follows: (1) If the offense of which such person is subsequently convicted is such that upon a first conviction, an offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term exceeding five years, such person is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than ten years."

The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the superior court to render a judgment sentencing the appellant to imprisonment in the state prison for such a term of years as, in its opinion, would be a just and fair punishment,—not less than ten years,—if there be no withdrawal of the prior convictions.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Laura SUMPTER et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.

S. S. CARTER.

(115 Ga. 893.)

*A testator, who died in 1864, left a will, in which, so far as material to this case, he disposed of his estate as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my beloved wife . . . all of my property and effects . . . during her natural life or widowhood, . . . and, in case of my said beloved wife not intermarrying, then in that event my will is that at her death that my whole estate be then equally divided between my six children, to wit, my five daughters [naming them] and my son [naming him]. My said effects thus going into the hands of my said daughters not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children. And in case either of my said six children should depart this life without leaving issue, then their part of my estate to be equally divided between my other children, to be controlled in the same way as first above directed." Neither of the testator's children had married when he died, and his widow never married again. Held:

(1) That, the intention of the testator is to be followed, unless clearly in conflict with the law existing at his death, and this intention is to be ascertained in the light of the whole will, and the attendant circumstances of the testator; and where there are devising clauses, especially of a remainder, they are to operate so as to vest the estate indefeasibly at the earliest possible period of time.

(2) That upon the death of the testator each of his children took a vested remainder interest, subject to be divested in favor of the testator's other children, as substituted devisees and remaindermen, upon such child dying during the existence of the life tenancy, without leaving a child who survived the life tenant; that, the son having died before the life tenant, leaving children who survived the latter, his remainder share became indefeasible upon the death of such life tenant; and that, therefore, under a deed executed during the life tenancy, by which the son conveyed to another all his interest in described realty, which belonged to the testator at the time of his death, the grantee, upon the death of the life tenant, became indefeasibly entitled to the son's remainder share therein.

(3) That children of a daughter of the testator, who, with her, survived the life tenant, were entitled to share, in common with their mother, in the remainder interest, which, upon the death of the testator, vested in the mother, subject, however, to open and let in such children; and that, hence, a deed executed by a daughter of the testator, which conveyed to another all her interest in described realty which belonged to the testator at his death, did not affect the interests therein of her children who were in life when the life tenant died.

ERROR to the Superior Court for Hall County to review a judgment construing the will of John M. Carter, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. H. Dean, for plaintiffs in error:

It is clearly manifest that the testator intended to create a life estate in presenti in his widow, the remainder to be in abeyance until her death, provided she remained a widow, and that he intended that the estate should remain intact until the death of the widow, and then be equally divided among his children, and that that portion going into the hands of his daughters should not be subject to the control of any husband, but should belong to his daughters and their children; and the manifest intention of the testator was that it was to be divided among such children of his daughters as would be in life at the death of his wife.

Toole v. Perry, 80 Ga. 681, 7 S. E. 118.

Messrs. Albert & Hughes also for plaintiffs in error.

Mr. H. H. Perry, for defendant in error:

The six children each took a vested remainder in fee, subject to be defeated if they died without leaving issue, and the plaintiffs, not being in esse at testator's death, took no interest either as tenants in common or in remainder.

The mere use of the word "children" when none are in esse is not sufficient to postpone the full effect of a will, and cause the estate to open for children born after.

The word "children" when there are none in esse is a mere word of inheritance, and carries no more significance than the word "heirs."

There being nothing in this will to show an intention to limit the children's interest to a life estate, they take an absolute estate,

Fish, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The will of John M. Carter, Sr., who was the grandfather of the plaintiffs in error, was executed August 26, 1863, and is, so far as material to this case, as follows: "I give, bequeath, and devise to my beloved wife, Amelia Carter, all my property and effects, during her natural life or widowhood . . . and, in case of my said beloved wife not intermarrying, then in that event my will is that at her death my whole estate be then equally divided between my six children, to wit, my five daughters, Lucinda, Almada, Sarah Elizabeth, Teresa, and Thena Alieva, and my son, Sanders Taylor Carter. My said effects thus going into the hands of my said daughters not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children. And in case either of my said six children should depart this life without leaving issue, then their part of my estate to be equally divided between my other children, to be controlled in the same way as first above directed." The testator died in the year 1864. His wife, the life tenant, died in 1898, without having intermarried. The son executed a deed to his interest in certain described land which belonged to the testator at the time of his death to the defendant in error, and died before the life tenant, leaving children surviving her. The five daughters, on the same day the son executed his deed, also made deeds conveying all of their interests in the same property to the defendant in error, and each survived the life tenant, with children surviving her, born after the testator's death. Plaintiffs in error brought an equitable petition against the defendant in error, praying for a construction of the will of their grandfather, John M. Carter, and for a joint and several recovery of whatever interests they were entitled to under the will in this land, conveyed by their respective parents to the defendant in error, and that the land be sold, and the proceeds be partitioned between the different owners thereof according to their respective interests therein. The petition, after amendment, was dismissed on demurrer, the court holding that none of the plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the allegations of the petition. To this ruling the plaintiffs excepted.

1. In construing wills, as they rarely use exactly the same language, each case is to be determined on its own merits (Cook v. Weaver, 12 Ga. 47; Olmstead v. Dunn, 72 Ga. 850-857), and the intention of the testator is to be diligently sought for and followed, if consistent with law (Civil Code, § 3324; Usry v. Hobbs, 58 Ga. 33; Bailey v. Ross, 66 Ga. 363, 364; Morton v. Murrell, 68 Ga. 145; Hudgens v. Wilkins, 77 Ga. 556). This law is that which existed at the death of the testator (Hertz v. Abrahams, 110 Ga. 707, 50 L. R. A. 361, 36 S. E. 409), and his intention only yields to the law when it clearly and decidedly conflicts therewith (Williams v. McIntyre, 8 Ga. 37). The intention of the testator must be gathered from the whole will. Edmondson v. Dyson, 2 Ga. 312; Benton v. Patterson, 8 Ga. 151; Cook v. Weaver, 12 Ga. 47; Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 123 (4); Felton v. Hill, 41 Ga. 554 (2); Tennille v. Phelps, 49 Ga. 540; Olmstead v. Dunn, 72 Ga. 850-857; Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 140. All the attendant circumstances of the testator and his family are to be considered. Cook v. Weaver, 12 Ga. 47; Williams v. McIntyre, 8 Ga. 37; Tennille v. Phelps, 49 Ga. 540; Olmstead v. Dunn, 72 Ga. 850-857. And all divesting clauses, especially as to remainders, are to be strictly construed so as to vest the estate absolutely at the earliest possible period of time. 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 467, 468, note 2; Bailey v. Ross, 66 Ga. 364.

2. The words of the testator devising the remainder: "In case of my said beloved wife not intermarrying, then in that event my will is that at her death my whole estate be then equally divided between my six children, to wit, my five daughters, Lucinda, Almeda, Sarah Elizabeth, Teresa, and Thelma Alieva, and my son, Sanders Taylor Carter,"—standing alone, would undoubtedly give an absolute or indefeasible estate in remainder to each of the said children, which would vest in interest at the testator's death and in possession at the life tenant's death 60 L. R. A.

(Shipp v. Gibbs, 88 Ga. 184, 14 S. E. 196); and the remainder share of a child who should die before the life tenant would descend to that child's heirs at law, whoever they might be (Civil Code, § 3101), or vest in such child's assigns by his or her deed thereto, made during the life tenancy (Id. § 3601). And the superadded words of the testator: "And in case either of my said six children should depart this life without leaving issue, then their part in my estate to be equally divided between my other children,"—do not change the vested remainder, previously and explicitly given to each child, into a contingent remainder to only those children of the testator who survive the life tenant, but merely designate the contingent event upon which such remainder to each child may become divested prior to the time of its vesting in possession at the period of distribution, namely, at the death of the life tenant, in favor of the testator's other children and remaindermen then living as substituted devisees. When we bear in mind that the entire estate given in remainder to the testator's six children was to be equally divided among them at the death of the life tenant, and that each child's vested remainder interest by subsequent words was simply made defeasible, upon the mere contingency of such child dying without leaving issue, in favor of the others as survivors, we then have the key to the intention of the testator, which is clearer than in devises to A, and upon his death to B, C, and D, and the survivors of them. The dying of a remainderman in the case in hand without leaving issue—which is the sole contingency upon which such remainderman's vested share otherwise distributable to him or her at the death of the life tenant is to be divested—cannot be referred to a death before the testator, whereby the whole remainder is to vest in the other children and remaindermen as survivors at his death, because he fixed a later period, namely, at the death of the life tenant, for the distribution or vesting in possession of his whole estate among the remaindermen then entitled indefeasibly; and as the time when his "other children" and remaindermen, as survivors, were to be ascertained to take the share of a child dying previously without leaving issue living at the life tenant's death, and because the life tenant, who was not incapacitated from taking the estate given to her, neither died nor renounced her life interest before the testator's death, which events alone would have accelerated the vesting in possession of the remainder interest at the testator's death, and fixed the persons then entitled thereto indefeasibly. 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 895; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 489. And it cannot be made referable to the dying of either remainderman after the life tenant, because, instead of one division taking place at one fixed period, as the testator directed, there would then be partial divisions occurring one after another, as often as a remainderman died after the life tenant without leaving children; or all the remaindermen might die without leaving children, and in that event, when the last child died, the whole estate would have to revert to the testator's heirs at law. This construction would not only prevent the free alienation of the property, and violate the rule of the law that divesting clauses, especially as to remainders, must be strictly construed, so as to absolutely vest the estate at the earliest possible period of time, and not postpone the vesting of estates in possession indefinitely, but would simply make a will for the testator. Hence, the irresistible conclusion is that the wards "dying without leaving issue," as applying to a divestment of any child's vested remainder share in favor of the other children of the testator and remaindermen, as substituted devisees, clearly refer to a dying within the lifetime of the life tenant so as to vest the remainder in the whole estate indefeasibly at the death of the life tenant, as the testator directed. It is just the same as if the testator, as to his son's remainder interest, had said: "At the death of my wife, the life tenant, my son is to have an equal share in my whole estate absolutely; but, should he die before the time I thus fix for him to have his share vested indefeasibly in possession, without leaving children in esse at that time, then, and then only, I give his share to my other children and remaindermen who survive the said period of distribution." A vested remainder may be absolutely or defeasibly vested. And "a vested remainder subject to a divesting contingency has, until the contingency happens, all the incidents of an indefeasible interest; if the contingency never happens . . . the estate becomes absolute." 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 854. The vested remainder share of the testator's son was subject to be divested, upon the sole contingency of the son dying without leaving issue in esse at the life tenant's death, in favor of his sisters and other devisees then living. This contingency never happened. Therefore, in consonance with the testator's intention and the soundest reason, there being no devise to the children of the son, the latter's vested remainder share became absolute and indefeasible upon his dying before the life tenant, leaving issue in esse at the life tenant's death (Besant v. Cox, L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 604,—which is directly in point), or upon his surviving the life tenant, with or without children, which supports the immediate preceding principle (Ibid.; Bonser v. Cox, 6 Beav. 82; M'Graw v. Davenport, 6 Port. [Ala.] 319; Williamson v. Chamberlain, 10 N. J. Eq. 373, approved in Baldwin v. Taylor, 37 N. J. Eq. 83; McCormick v. McElligott, 127 Pa. 230, 17 Atl. 896, and the cases cited in the circuit judge's opinion. Lee v. Mumford, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1585, 44 S. W. 91; Weakley v. Hanna, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 450, 51 S. W. 570; Forsythe v. Lansing, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1064, 59 S. W. 854). And, even if the will in this case had made the vested remainder interest of the son defeasible by an express devise to his children in case of his death, his death would mean a dying within the lifetime of the life tenant, and hence his children could not take under the express contingent devise to them if he survived the life tenant, because his remainder share would then vest in him indefeasibly. Bartlett v. Bartlett, 33 Ga. Supp. 174 (construing the third item with the fourth, fifth, and sixth items of the will in that case); Bailey v. Ross, 66 Ga. 354, 363-365, and the cases cited on latter page; Hervey v. McLaughlin, 1 Price, 204, 16 Revised Rep. 713; Galland v. Leonard, 1 Swanst. 161, 18 Revised Rep. 44; Olivant v. Wright, L. R. 1 Ch. Div. 346; Vidal v. Verdier, Speers Eq. 402; Galway v. Bryce, 10 Misc. 255, 30 N. Y. Supp. 985. And the cases of Usry v. Hobbs, 58 Ga. 32; Doty v. Wray, 66 Ga. 153; Lufburrow v. Koch, 75 Ga. 448; Clark v. Henry, L. R. 11 Eq. 222, 227, 228; Bishop v. McClelland, 44 N. J. Eq. 450, 1 L. R. A. 551, 16 Atl. 1; Wolfe v. VanNostrand, 2 N. Y. 438-442; Fields v. Whitfield, 101 N. C. 305, 7 S. E. 780; together with 3 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 611, and Smith, Executory Interest, § 658,—also give light in support of the principles here discussed.

The children of the testator's son take no estate under the will, either expressly or by implication; and the latter class of estates are not favored. McCord v. Whitehead, 98 Ga. 385, 25 S. E. 767. This rule as to estates by implication applies with especial force to the case at bar, as there is no intent whatever on the part of the testator to give his son a lesser estate than a remainder in fee in his whole share, which was only to be divested, in favor of the testator's other children and remaindermen, upon the contingency hereinbefore explained, which never happened. The existence of the son's children at the time of the death of the life tenant, he having died before, simply fulfills one of the provisions in the testator's will, whereby the son's remainder share, which was defeasibly vested, would then become indefeasible. If he had made no deed to his remainder interest, his children in life at the time of the death of the life tenant would have taken his then indefeasible remainder share by inheritance from him. But his deed, on account of his leaving children in esse at the death of the life tenant, which then made his remainder absolute, passed that absolute interest to his grantee. This principle is upheld in Chewning v. Shumate, 106 Ga. 752, 753, 32 S. E. 544; Davis v. Hollingsworth, 113 Ga. 210, 38 S. E. 827, and Oliver v. Powell, 114 Ga. 592, 40 S. E. 826. It is only when the defeasible remainder interest of a testator's child who dies before the life tenant is expressly given in that contingency to his children, that his deed made during the life tenancy would not convey the absolute fee at the life tenant's death as against his children surviving the latter period. Galway v. Bryce, 10 Misc. 255, 30 N. Y. Supp. 985, 986.

3. We are thus brought to a consideration of the remainder interests of the five daughters who married after the testator's death, and survived the life tenant, with children then living. After first giving to these daughters, together with his son, each by name, a vested remainder in his whole estate, to be equally divided among them at the death of the life tenant, the testator says: "My effects thus going into the hands of my said daughters not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children. And in case either of my said six children should depart this life without leaving issue, then their part of my estate to be equally divided between my other children, to be controlled in the same way as first above directed." The vital question here presented is, Does this devise in remainder create an estate tail in the daughters, which would give them the fee under our act of December 21, 1821 (Cobb's Digest, 169), or does it create a tenancy in common between the daughters and their children born up to and living at the time of the vesting of the remainder in possession at the death of the life tenant? The answer to this question depends upon whether the word "children" in the phrase "and their children" was used in the sense of a word of limitation or not. There is no middle ground. We think that the testator clearly intended to create the estate last mentioned, and that such intention violated no rule of law in force at his death or at any other time. If the devise had been of an immediate estate, to vest in interest and in possession at the death of the testator, as directly, in the first place, to a daughter and her children (the daughter having no children when the will took effect), there could then be no doubt that such devise would create an estate tail in the daughter. One of the rules in Wild's Case, 6 Coke, 17, and its meaning is thus stated in 3 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 174: "Where lands are devised to a person and his children, and he has no child at the time of the devise, the parent takes an estate tail; for it is said: 'the intent of the deviser is manifest and certain that the children (or issues) should take, and as immediate devisees they cannot take, because they are not in rerum natura, and by way of remainder they cannot take, for that was not his (the devisor's) intent, for the gift is immediate; therefore such words shall be taken as words of limitation.'" The modification of this rule, as suggested by Jarman (Id. 177), so that children living at the death of the testator, when the will takes effect, would not be excluded as purchasers in an immediate devise in interest and possession at the testator's death to A and his children, has been approved in this state, whereby such children and their parent would take as tenants in common. Hoyle v. Jones, 35 Ga. 40, 89 Am. Dec. 273; Gillespie v. Schuman, 62 Ga. 252; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 384, 385, 7 S. E. 554. As thus modified, and applying it to such immediate devisees or grants in cases where A has no child living at the testator's death or at the execution and delivery of the deed, the aforesaid rule, by which A then takes an estate tail, has been followed by many decisions of this court and adopted into our Code. Civil Code, § 3085; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 374, 7 S. E. 554; Estill v. Biers, 82 Ga. 608, 9 S. E. 596; Baird v. Brookin, 86 Ga. 709, 712, 12 L. R. A. 157, 12 S. E. 981; McCord v. Whitehead, 98 Ga. 385, 25 S. E. 767; Hollis v. Lawton, 107 Ga. 102, 32 S. E. 846. If the devise were to A for life, and after A's death to B and her children, without more (B having no children at testator's death), the devise might, though we are not called on by the facts in the case at bar to say it necessarily would, create an estate tail in B, on the assumption that "children" in the phrase "and her children," unexplained by preceding, associated, or superadded words, was used in the sense of "issue" generally, and therefore a word of limitation, as held in Butler v. Ralston, 69 Ga. 485. Jarman, in his work on Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 178, thus speaks of a principle which he thought ought to apply to devises in remainder to A and his children simpliciter: "If the literal terms of the rule in Wild's Case can be departed from in the manner suggested in order to give effect to its spirit, it would seem to follow that the parent would never be held to take an estate tail if there were a child, who, according to the established rules of construction, could have taken jointly with the parent. Consequently, if the devise were future, so that all children coming in case before the period of vesting in possession would be entitled, the rule which makes the parent tenant in tail would (if at all) only come into operation in the absence of any such objects. In Broadhurst v. Morris, 2 Barn. & Ad. 11, the rule seems to have been applied to a devise of this description, but this peculiarity in the case does not appear to have attracted attention." And "this peculiarity in the case" was not considered in our own case of Butler v. Ralston. The principle thus referred to by Jarman is upheld in the recent case of Mitchell v. Mitchell, 73 Conn. 303, 47 Atl. 325, and is intimated to be correct in the later case of Childers v. Logan, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1239, 65 S. W. 124. But if this principle is not applicable in cases like Butler v. Ralston (and we do not now hold that it is), such cases are no authority in the case at bar, where the will contains associated and superadded words explaining the sense in which the word "children" was used. In Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 146, the case of Butler v. Ralston is expressly referred to, and thus distinguished: "It is sufficient to reply that . . . there were no superadded words to show that the maker of the instrument intended that the words used should be construed to be words of purchase, and not of limitation." The decision in Butler v. Ralston itself fully recognizes the principle that the word "children," in a devise to A and his children, can be shown to be a word of purchase by explanatory words in other parts of the will.

It cannot be questioned, certainly in this state, that words of limitation in one particular clause of a will or deed, which, standing alone, create an express estate tail, under either the rule in Wild's Case or that in Shelley's Case [1 Coke, 88], may be explained by other and superadded words in the instrument to mean a word of purchase, which will prevent an estate tail. Dudley v. Mallory, 4 Ga. 61-63; Benton v. Patterson, 8 Ga. 151, 152; Kemp v. Daniel, 8 Ga. 385, 387; Dudley v. Porter, 16 Ga. 615-619; Williams v. Allen, 17 Ga. 81, 82; Sharman v. Jackson, 30 Ga. 224; Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 142-147. As is said in Benton v. Patterson, which exemplifies the rulings in the other cases: "The whole will must be considered together, and it will not do to rest the construction upon any particular clause." The principle referred to in 3 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 239, that a mere limitation over upon a definite failure of issue at the death of the first taker will not explain the word "issue" in the antecedent devise to A and his issue if A has no issue, but will ingraft a contingency upon the estate first devised, clearly applies to such devises which take effect in possession at the testator's death. In England such devises give A an estate tail, with remainder over expectant upon the happening of the contingency (Ibid.); and, if only personality is bequeathed, A takes the fee, subject to be divested in favor of the executory legatees upon his dying without a child. Lyon v. Mitchell, 1 Madd. 467. The English rule as to personality in such cases has been followed in Georgia as to realty also, and we have an illustration of this principle in the case of Davis v. Hollingsworth, 113 Ga. 210, 38 S. E. 827. Yet even in such cases the vice chancellor in Lyon v. Mitchell (page 481) said that the extent of the estate given under the first devise is to be governed by the words in the limitation over, "where they bear upon, and unite with, and tend to affect the construction of the prior words, and which in many cases may enable us to come to a conclusion respecting it." He also said (pp. 472, 473) that a devise to A and his issue as tenants in common would be another mode of showing a legal intention on the part of the testator not to create an estate tail; but we think this would apply to estates vesting in possession at some period after the testator's death, rather than at his death. There are doubtless cases which hold that the principle last mentioned above by Jarman also applies where there is a remainder to A and his issue, or heirs of his body, or children (A having none), with a naked limitation over at his death, whenever that might occur, without issue or children; for, in such cases death would not be confined to a dying before the life tenant; there would be no substituted devisees to take the remainder indefeasibly at the death of the life tenant, and therefore no children of A who could take an estate in common with him when the life estate terminated. That courts will lay hold of any legitimate facts or words to uphold the intention of the testator not to create an estate tail is also shown in the distinction made between an immediate devise in possession to A and his children and a remainder to A and his children without a gift over, and A, in each case, has a child living when the will was made or the testator died. In an immediate devise (that is, to take effect in possession at the death of the testator) to A and his children, and A has a child living, A and this child would take as joint tenants in England, under one of the rules or resolutions in Wild's Case, 6 Coke, 17, 18; 3 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 179; and as tenants in common in Georgia. Gillespie v. Solomon, 62 Ga. 252; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 384, 385, 7 S. E. 554. After-born children would be excluded. Ibid. The latter children, not being in rerum natura, could not acquire the legal title to an immediate estate in possession, and they could not take a remainder, for such was not the testator's intent. On the other hand, if the devise is to A for life, and at A's death to B and her children, and B had a child living when the will was made or the testator died, not only that child, but all other children born up to and living at the death of the life tenant would take the remainder jointly or in common with their parent. Oates v. Jackson, 2 Strange, 1172; Annable v. Patch, 3 Pick. 363. This last ruling is made independent of any rule in Wild's Case. It is based upon the fact that, as there was a child in life when the will was made or the testator died, he intended all children of B to take as purchasers when the remainder vested in possession, and that this intent is upheld by the well-known rules of law that a remainder to unborn children is legal, and that all children born up to and living at the time fixed for the vesting of the remainder in possession are entitled to take as purchasers. Even in England, where the intention of the testator is presumed in favor of the creation of an estate tail, the courts in cases of a remainder to A and his issue or children (A having no child when the will was made or the testator died) give effect to other words in the will to restrict the word "issue" or "children" to a word of purchase. In Hockley v. Mawbey, 3 Bro. Ch. 82, the devise was to the testator's wife during her life; at her death to the testator's son and to his issue lawfully begotten or to be begotten, to be divided among them as he (the son) thought fit; and, if the son died without issue, then to the children of the testator's sisters. The lord chancellor said: "He [the testator] did not mean the estate to go as an estate tail, but that the children should take distributively, in which case they must take as purchasers; and the consequence is that Richard [the son] took only an estate for life. . . . In order to take, they [the children] must be alive at the death of Richard [the son]. . . . It is sufficient that the division must take place at the death of Richard [the son], which is within the rules,"—that is, as against a perpetuity. If it had been possible under the terms of the will in Hockley v. Mawbey to restrict children of the son to those living at the life tenant's death, when the son and his children, if any, would then take the remainder indefeasibly, could a reasonable doubt exist that the court would have held that the remainder absolutely vested in possession in the son and his children then living? We think not, because such devise including the children would not only be within the rule showing no perpetuity, but the children would be in existence to share in the division of the remainder indefeasibly at the life tenant's death. And such a construction would be more readily adhered to in this state, where, as held in Dudley v. Mallery, 4 Ga. 62; Benton v. Patterson, 8 Ga. 151; Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 145, 146; and Dudley v. Porter, 16 Ga. 616,—the intention of testators is not to be presumed in favor of the creation of estates tail.

In the case at bar the words of the testator, associated with the devise in remainder to his daughters, to belong to them and their children, and the superadded words immediately subjoined thereto, show beyond all doubt that the word "children" was used by him as a word of purchase, which utterly precludes an estate tail in the daughters. The testator first provides that at the death of his wife, the life tenant, his whole estate is to be equally divided among his six children, one son and five daughters, whom he specifically names. Then he adds: "My said effects thus going into the hands of my said daughters [that is, at the death of the life tenant] not to be subject to the control of any husband, but the same to belong to my said daughters and their children." The testator here evidently meant that the property should belong to his daughters and their children living at the life tenant's death, for the distributive word "belong," which is a word of ownership, applies to the children as well as to their mothers, and the death of the life tenant is the time fixed by his preceding words for this distribution of his whole estate to be made indefeasibly. "The primary definition of the word 'belong' is 'to be the property of.'" 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 915. "To be the property of" the children, they must take as purchasers, and the mode of their taking in this state would be in common with their mothers. The devise, then, down to this point, is certainly as strong as one made in remainder to A and her children as tenants in common; and "the provision that they should take as tenants in common . . . shows very distinctly that the testator was contemplating something very different from an estate tail." Doc ex dem. Strong v. Goff, 11 East, 671. Moreover, the legal estate in remainder is not devised directly to his daughters and their children. On the contrary, it goes into the hands of the daughters at the death of the life tenant, to belong to them and their children. These words create a trust, and make the daughters trustees for their children, if any. Civil Code, § 4138; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 3, and note 3; Gordon v. Green, 10 Ga. 535 (6), 541. The will made provision for the daughters to hold the legal estate of their own portions, as well as the portions to belong to their children, free from the control of their husbands. They were capable of acting as trustees for their children. 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 16, 20. And even if they were incompetent, for any reason, to act as such trustees, a court of equity would appoint trustees to execute the trusts. Ibid.; Civil Code, § 3179. A trust for unborn children to take in remainder is legal, just as a remainder for unborn children without a trust is legal. And the trust would continue executory after the termination of the life estate only until the children became of legal age, when the law itself would execute the trust, and divide the property without any act on the part of the trustee. The fact that the husbands of the testator's daughters in Toole v. Perry, 80 Ga. 681, 7 S. E. 118, were made trustees of the remainders devised to the daughters and their children was one of the reasons commented on in Baird v. Brookins, 86 Ga. 716, 12 L. R. A. 157, 12 S. E. 981, for holding that "children," in Toole v. Perry, was used as a word of purchase. Such reason certainly applies with much greater force in the case at bar, where the property is expressly directed to go into the hands of the daughters themselves at the death of the life tenant, to belong to them and their children, which, as best comporting with reason and the intention of the testator, means a trust for the daughters' immediate descendants in esse at the death of the life tenant, when the testator's whole estate was to be divided indefeasibly, and not a trust for the daughters to hold for their issue in infinitum. The words, then, of the testator thus far alone strongly indicate, if they do not conclusively show, that when he made his will "he had in mind a class of persons [to wit, children of his daughters] who might thereafter be born" (Hollis v. Lawton, 107 Ga. 106, 32 S. E. 846), and within the period, too, fixed by him for the distribution of his entire property in remainder indefeasibly. But, to put his meaning beyond the pale of doubt, the testator shows by his superadded words how and to whom any such remainder share shall go at the life tenant's death, by substitution, if either of his daughters should die before the life tenant without a child surviving the life tenant's death. Immediately subjoined to the devise in remainder to go into the hands of his daughters at the death of the life tenant, to belong to them and their children, he says: "And in case either of my said six children should depart this life [that is, before the life tenant] without leaving issue [that is, in esse at the death of the life tenant], then their part of my estate to be equally divided between my other children;" that is, the testator's other children living at the death of the life tenant, which is the period fixed by the testator for the distribution of his whole estate indefeasibly, as shown by the construction hereinbefore placed upon this clause of the testator's will in deciding the nature of his son's remainder interest. And then the testator makes the final and important provision that any remainder share thus taken by his other children, as substituted devisees, at the life tenant's death is "to be controlled in the same way as first above directed;" that is, just as the remainder shares to the son and to the five daughters were previously given down to the divesting clause, to wit, if his son survived the life tenant, with or without children, he should then take an equal part of any divested remainder share by substitution, and also his own specific remainder share absolutely; if any daughter survived the life tenant, without children, she should then take an equal part of any divested remainder share by substitution, and also her own specific remainder share absolutely, although children might afterwards be born to her; and if any daughter survived the life tenant, with children, she should then receive into her hands an equal part of any divested remainder share by substitution, and also the specific remainder share first devised to go into her hands at the life tenant's death, to belong to her and her children (that is, her children then living) absolutely. No person who was intended by the testator to take could by law take any part of his property after its division, or the life tenant's death, for that division was to be of the testator's whole estate, indefeasibly. The devisees, then, in remainder to each daughter, to belong to her and her children, are to a collection of persons, uncertain in number, to be ascertained at the death of the life tenant; and, whether such persons be called a class per se or not, the legal conclusion which we have reached would necessarily follow. "A number of persons are popularly said to form a class when they can be designated by some general name as 'children,' 'grandchildren,' 'nephews,' but in legal language the question whether a gift is one to a class depends, not upon these considerations, but upon the mode of gift itself, namely, that it is a gift of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift, to be ascertained at a future time, and who are all to take in equal or in some other definite proportions, the share of each being dependent for its amount upon the ultimate number of persons." 1 Jarman, Wills, Randolph & T.'s ed. 534. And while a remainder to A and her children simpliciter (A having none when the testator died) may not be a devise to a class, yet a devise in remainder to A and her children living at the life tenant's death, or of an estate at an earlier period of distribution after the testator's death, may, in legal effect, be called one to a class (Mitchell v. Mitchell, 73 Conn. 303, 47 Atl. 326); and all living at the period of distribution will take equally, unless otherwise directed by the testator (Ibid.). One of the principal objections sometimes urged to construing "children," in such cases, as a word of purchase, namely, that the issue of the children would not take upon the latter's death before the period of distribution, finds no place or lodgment in the case before us, for two reasons: First, any divested remainder share goes to the testator's own children and his daughters and their children, if any, by substitution, at the life tenant's death, neither great-grandchildren nor other remote kindred being the objects of his bounty; secondly, in a case of substitution, like this one, the nonexistence of a daughter and her children at the death of the life tenant, though she might have had children before that time, would not pass that particular share to the heirs of such daughter or children, because the testator himself designates the persons who shall take at the life tenant's death as substituted devisees.

It is impossible to hold that the testator's daughters take an estate tail, which would result in giving to them the absolute fee, under our act of December 21, 1821, because such ruling could only be made by construing the devise as a simple and naked one to A and her children or issue generally. And we cannot hold that the daughters take an estate tail, whereby, under the act of 1821, the fee given would be made determinable upon a mere limitation over on a definite failure of issue if a daughter died at any time without a child, because that construction would include a postponement of the vesting of the remainder in possession absolutely beyond the life tenant's death; and because there is no limitation over in this case, but a mere substitution, to take effect at the death of the life tenant, if at all. Therefore the logical and legal conclusion is that the remainder shares to the daughters go into their hands at the death of the life tenant, to belong to them and their children then living as tenants in common; and that such remainder shares, which vested in interest in the daughters at the testator's death, consequently open to take in their said children at the period of distribution. We think this ruling harmonizes the whole will, and also upholds the rule of law favoring the vesting of remainders indefeasibly at the earliest possible period of time, which the intention of the testator in this case manifestly follows. We may add that "this belongs to a class of cases where one case seldom rules another, for the reason that each will must be interpreted by itself, and does not depend to any great extent on prior interpretations of other wills." The principles in the case of Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 133, explaining the word "issue" in a prior clause to the testator's unmarried daughter and her issue during her life by the superadded words to mean "children" and a word of purchase, and in Toole v. Perry, 80 Ga. 681, 7 S. E. 118, showing that a devise in remainder to the testator's daughter and her children included children born after the testator's death, and also by a second marriage, and living at the period of distribution, on the strength of subsequent words presuming that the testator meant children by her present or any future husband, apply as authority in the case under consideration. These cases are recognized as correct in Hollis v. Lawton, 107 Ga. 106, 32 S. E. 846, and are therein distinguished from the facts in that case, which was the grant of an immediate estate in possession to A and her children, without any explanatory words, and it was there correctly held that no child born after the estate vested in possession was entitled. In Blankenbaker v. Woodruff, 97 Ky. 276, 30 S. W. 614. the testator gave a life estate to his wife; with a remainder to three daughters by name (one of them being unmarried), to be equally divided among the daughters upon the widow's decease, "for their benefit and the benefit of the heirs of their natural bodies, up to the age of thirty years on the part of each of said heirs of their natural bodies." It was held that the latter words explained the preceding words "heirs of their natural bodies" to mean children in esse at the life tenant's death, and that, therefore, each daughter took a fee-simple estate in remainder jointly with her children, if she had any, upon the death of the life tenant.

Among the cases holding that a devise to A for life, with remainder to B and his children (B having no child at the time of the devise), and, if B dies without children or issue, then to C, gives B an estate tail, are Broadhurst v. Morris, 2 Barn. & Ad. 11; Wood v. Baron, 1 East, 259; Moore v. Gary, 149 Ind. 51, 48 N. E. 630; and Parkman v. Bowdoin, 1 Sumn. 359, Fed. Cas. No. 10,763. They are, however, all clearly distinguishable in their facts from the case at bar, which, among other things, is not, like them, a case of a limitation over, but of a substitution, pure and simple, to take effect, if at all, at the life tenant's death. In Broadhurst v. Morris the remainder was to B and his lawfully begotten children forever, and in default of such issue at his decease to C. The contention was that the limitation over should be construed as if a comma had been placed after "issue," and therefore as upon an indefinite failure of issue. The clause is so construed by Judge Story in Parkman v. Bowdoin, 1 Sumn. 369, Fed. Cas. No. 10,763. And this court construed the clause to mean an indefinite failure of issue in Wiley v. Smith, 3 Ga. 565. The English court, without apparently considering the principle as to what persons would be entitled at the time for the remainder to vest in possession, and there being nothing to show that the dying of B, the remainderman, was referable to a dying within the lifetime of the life tenant, simply delivered a four-line opinion that B took an estate tail. In Wood v. Baron, the remainder was to B, to hold as a place of inheritance, to her and her children or her issue, and, if she die leaving no child or children, or if the latter should die without issue, then to C. Lord Kenyon thought the words in the limitation over meant upon an indefinite failure of issue, and distinguished it from several cases he cited in which the words are different and upon a definite failure of issue, but said the court would consider it. Afterwards the court certified, in less than four lines, that B took an estate tail, manifestly because, as Lord Kenyon had intimated, the words in the limitation over imported an indefinite failure of issue under the common-law rule of construction, and this was no doubt the reason, inasmuch as B had a child in life when the will was made and when the testator died. In Moore v. Gary, the remainder was to B and his issue, being his own children lawfully begotten, forever, and, upon his dying without issue—that is, without heirs, being his own children lawfully begotten, living at his death—to C. The court held that both the antecedent and superadded clause meant an indefinite failure of issue, and therefore that B took an estate tail. In Parkman v. Bowdoin the remainder was to B and to his lawful begotten children in fee simple forever, but, in case he should die without children lawfully begotten, to C. The opinion was rendered by Justice Story, and is by far the best of its kind of which we have knowledge. Like the other cases here distinguished, there was nothing in that case confining the death of B. within the lifetime of the life tenant. Justice Story spoke of a remainder being an immediate estate, but he overlooked the wide distinction and consequent results between a remainder vested in interest and a remainder vested in possession. And he finally held that the limitation over meant an indefinite failure of issue, which made the word "children" in the preceding clause, "and his children," retain its original sense as a word of limitation, and gave B an estate tail. This construction, which was based on the common-law rule existing prior to the English wills act that went into effect on January 1, 1838, is contrary to what would be decided in this state since our act of 1854, which changed the meaning of all such phrases into a definite failure of issue, and therefore Parkman v. Bowdoin, as well as the preceding cases distinguished, would be no authority in this state as to a will made since said act, even on an identically phrased or worded will. There are other cases where estates were given to B and his children, to vest in B at twenty-one years of age, and, if he died before twenty-one, to C, in which it was held that B took an estate tail,—as in Davie v. Stevens, 1 Dougl. 321. Besides being wholly unlike the case at bar, a reading of that case will show that B was never even married when the estate vested in him in possession at the age of twenty-one. From what we have said about these cases it is seen of what little value precedents are in construing a will, unless the facts are precisely or substantially alike, and the cases decided do not omit the consideration of well-established and apposite rules of construction.

It follows that in the case now in hand a deed executed by a daughter of the testator, which conveyed to another all her interest in described realty which belonged to the testator at his death, did not affect the interest therein of her children who were in life when the life tenant died. From the foregoing it follows that the trial judge correctly held that the petition set forth no cause of action in behalf of the plaintiffs who are the children of the testator's son, but that he erred in ruling that the other plaintiffs who are the children of the daughters of the testator were not entitled to recover under the allegations of the petition.

Judgment reversed.

IDAHO SUPREME COURT.

Bridget E. BEELER, Admr., etc., of Joseph P. Beeler, Deceased, Appt.,
v.

C. C. MERCANTILE COMPANY, Limited,
et al., Respts.

(.....Idaho.....)

*1. A hotel building, affixed to land, and held and conveyed with the land upon which it stands as real estate, cannot thereafter, by mere agreement of the parties, become a chattel or personal property, and be legally encumbered by a chattel mortgage, until after its severance from the land.

2. A chattel mortgage on real estate creates no lien thereon, as the provisions of § 3385, Rev. Stat., as amended, are a prohibition against mortgaging real estate by chattel mortgage.

(December 4, 1902.)

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the District Court for Kootenai County in favor of defendants in an action to enjoin foreclosure of a chattel mortgage. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles L. Heitman, for appellant:

A house or other building which, from its size, or the materials of which it is constructed, or the manner in which it is fixed to the land, cannot be removed without practically destroying it, will not become a mere chattel by means of any agreement which can be made concerning it.

Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 344; Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 315, 13 Am. Rep. 595; Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray, 536, 66 Am. Dec. 424; Lyle v. Palmer, 42 Mich. 314, 3 N. W. 921; Docking v. Frazell, 34 Kan. 29, 7 Pac. 618.

Personal chattels which have become fixtures are incorporated in, and are a part of, the land as much as a house or a tree, until an actual severance.

Bond v. Coke, 71 N. C. 97.

The execution of a chattel mortgage on fixtures does not create a severance.

Sullivan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to enjoin the sheriff of Kootenai county from foreclosing a chattel mortgage on a hotel building situated in Bonner's Ferry, under the provisions of §§ 3390-3393 of the Revised Statutes, by notice and sale, and to have said chattel mortgage declared null and void. The facts are substantially as follows: On April 11, 1900, Joseph P. Beeler executed to the C. C. Mercantile Company, Limited, five promissory notes amounting in the aggregate to $900, and to secure the payment of the same executed said chattel mortgage on the hotel building known as the "International Hotel," situated on lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, in block 5, first addition to Bonner's Ferry, Kootenai county. Said hotel building is referred to as personal property in said mortgage. Said Beeler thereafter died, and Bridget E. Beeler was appointed administratrix of his estate, and commenced this suit as such administratrix. On April 11, 1901, the respondent corporation began proceedings to foreclose said chattel mortgage by the sheriff, under the provisions of the above-cited sections of the Revised Statutes, and this action was commenced for the purpose above stated, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the respondent corporation. The pleadings are of considerable length, but the main issue is as to whether said hotel building is personal property or real estate. There is no substantial conflict in the evidence. The evidence shows that said hotel building is a large, substantial, two-story frame building, consisting of twenty or more rooms. A part of it had been removed to said lots, and a part built thereon by the predecessors of Beeler. It also appears that said lots of land, together with the hotel building, had for some time prior to the date of said chattel mortgage been owned, conveyed, occupied, and used by the grantors of Beeler as real estate, and on April 11, 1900, said grantors, by warranty deed, conveyed said hotel building, together with said lots of real estate, to said Beeler, and he used, held, and occupied it as real estate during his lifetime. It also appears that Lucas, Markle, and Gray, grantors of said Beeler, had encumbered said real estate by giving a real-estate mortgage thereon to the respondent corporation, and that said lots and hotel building were treated as real estate by it. It also appears that said Beeler sold and conveyed to the respondent the east half of said lots, with the agreement and understanding that he could remove said hotel building from said lots; that he undertook to remove a part of it,—the kitchen,—but was prevented from doing so by an adjoining property owner, and then moved it back again. It also appears that said chattel mortgage is dated April 11, 1900, and the deed from Beeler conveying the east half of said lots to the respondent was dated April 12, 1900; that, although the two instruments bear different dates, they were the culmination of a single agreement, by which Beeler had the right to remove said building. It appears that it was discussed between the parties as to what kind of a mortgage Beeler should give on the hotel building to protect the respondent, and it was finally decided that it should be a chattel mortgage, and it was given. It is thus made to appear that it was the intention and agreement of the parties that said hotel building should be considered to be personal property. It is also shown that the estate of said decedent is insolvent.

The main contention is as to whether said hotel building, under those facts, is real estate or personal property. It is contended by counsel for respondent that it is personal property; for the reason that at the time Beeler became the owner of it and the lots on which it stood he elected, for his own convenience, to treat the hotel building as a chattel, and to mortgage it as such, so that he might remove it from the lots, the east half of which he conveyed at the same time to another party; and that, having elected, at the very inception of his ownership, to treat it as a chattel, it became one; and that he might, under the law, place a valid chattel mortgage upon it. In support of that contention counsel cites Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 124, and authorities there cited, and Ewell, Fixtures, p. 68, and authorities there cited. The former authority holds that fixtures may become chattels by agreement of parties as between themselves, and it is conceded that the ordinary distinction between real estate and chattels exists in the nature of the subject, and cannot, in general, be changed by the convention or agreement of the parties. Mr. Ewell, after discussing the rule contended for by counsel, and citing authorities for and against it, says, on page 69, as follows: "The better reason and the weight of authority is, that such agreement [to change real estate to personal property] or understanding, express or implied, must have existed prior to the annexation of the chattel to the land; and that, if the thing is annexed by a stranger, without the prior consent of the owner of the land, or any contract with him, express or implied, it cannot afterwards become personal property by the mere oral assent of the landowner, without a severance from the land." In the case at bar the grantors of Joseph P. Beeler sold and conveyed to him by warranty deed said hotel building and the lots upon which it stood. They sold it as real estate, and Beeler bought it as real estate, and the building had not been severed from the land at the time said chattel mortgage was given or when this action was tried. In Burk v. Hollis, 98 Mass. 55, it is held that where a house, built on the land of another as personalty, was by him conveyed to the owner of the land, it at once becomes real estate, and the owner of the land cannot, by executing a chattel mortgage to secure part of the purchase money, sever and convey as personal estate any interest in it, merely by treating it as personal estate in the instrument of conveyance. Counsel for respondent relies to some extent upon Docking v. Frazell, 38 Kan. 420, 17 Pac. 160. That is a case from Kansas, and was twice appealed to the supreme court of that state. See 34 Kan. 29, 7 Pac. 618. On the first appeal the building in controversy was presumed to be real estate. Upon a retrial, after a reversal of the case, more testimony was introduced than at the original trial, and it was clearly shown that said building was moved onto leased lots, and by the terms of the written lease the lessee was required to remove the building placed thereon at the termination of the lease. And on the second appeal it was held that said building was personal property, and that a chattel mortgage given thereon was valid. Many of the authorities cited relate and apply to trade fixtures placed on leased premises with an agreement and understanding that they might be removed at the termination of the lease, and are not applicable to the facts of the case at bar. There is a clear distinction between that case and the one at bar. In the latter case the hotel building was erected on real estate owned by the persons who caused the hotel to be placed there, and had not been removed therefrom at the time said chattel mortgage was executed, and falls within the rule above quoted from Ewell on Fixtures to the effect that real-estate

tate fixtures cannot become personal property by the assent of the landowner without its severance from the land. Section 2825, Rev. Stat., defines the term "real estate" as follows: "Real property or real estate consists of: (1) Lands, possessory rights to land, ditch and water rights, and mining claims, both lode and placer; (2) that which is affixed to land; (3) that which is appurtenant to land." Said hotel building was affixed to and appurtenant to said lots of land at the time the chattel mortgage was given, and had prior to that date or on that date been transferred by warranty deed as real estate, and clearly was, under the terms of said section of the statute, real estate.

Section 3385, Rev. Stat., as amended (see Acts 1899, p. 292), prescribes upon what property a chattel mortgage may be given, and is as follows: "Chattel mortgages may be made upon all property, goods, or chattels, not defined by statute to be real estate, upon growing crops, and upon crops to be sown and grown in the future; but, should the persons executing mortgages upon crops, to be afterwards sown, fail to sow or cause the same to be sown, no lien of such mortgages shall attach to crops sown by other persons upon the lands described in said mortgages, except in so far as the mortgagors in said mortgages have or retain interests in said crops." The provisions of that section limit chattel mortgages to property other than real estate and upon crops. Therefore a valid chattel mortgage cannot be given upon property other than that there prescribed; and there is good reason for this rule, as the registry law requires (Acts 1899, p. 121) chattel mortgages to be filed with the county recorder, and kept there, and certain facts contained in the mortgage must be entered in a record kept for that purpose; while a real-estate mortgage must be filed by the recorder and recorded at length in a record provided for that purpose. They are recorded in different books, and a real-estate mortgage registered as a chattel mortgage, or vice versa, would not be a legal registry or recording. The provisions of said section are a prohibition against mortgaging real estate by chattel mortgage.

After defining real estate and personal property, our statute prescribes the method and manner of encumbering and transferring each class, and it is not in the power of parties to waive or alter, by their agreement, any of these regulations. In Hoyle v. Plattsburgh & M. R. Co. 54 N. Y. 315, 13 Am. Rep. 595, the court, in referring to rules established by statute for the transfer of property, said: "These regulations have been adopted with regard, not only to the interests of the parties immediately concerned, but also with regard to the interest of others in ascertaining the ownership of property." Also, see Richardson v. Copeland, 6 Gray, 536, 66 Am. Dec. 424. We think, under our statutes and the facts of this case, that the hotel building in controversy was real estate, and that said chattel mortgage created no lien upon it, and is therefore void. That being true, it is not necessary for us to pass upon the other errors assigned.

The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of the appellant as prayed for in the complaint. Costs are awarded to appellant.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Charles GILMORE, Plff. in Err.,

v.

Morris W. FULLER, by Next Friend.

(198 Ill. 130.)

1. One participating in a charivari of a wedding party cannot recover for injuries inflicted by the negligent discharge of a pistol by a coparticipant, where the statute imposes a fine upon whoever disturbs the peace of a family or neighborhood by loud and unusual noises, or disturbs any assembly of people met for a lawful purpose.
2. That instructions requested by the defeated party, embodying correct principles of law, were given to the jury, will not prevent a reversal if contradictory and erroneous instructions were given for his adversary.
3. Requested instructions to find for defendant on counts of a declaration charging him with assault by the discharge of a pistol should be given where there is no evidence tending in the slightest degree to show that he intended to do any harm, or that the wound inflicted on plaintiff was in any way intentional or wilful.

(October, 25, 1902.)

ERROR to the Appellate Court, Third District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Piatt County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Magruder, Ch. J.:

This is an action of trespass on the case, brought on April 7, 1899, by the defendant in error, a minor, suing by his next friend, Hollis D. Fuller, against the plaintiff in error, who at the time of the commencement of the suit was also a minor, but since the trial has attained his majority. The action was brought to recover damages for a personal injury. The trial below before the court and a jury resulted in verdict and judgment in favor of defendant in error for the sum of $1,500. An appeal was taken to the appellate court, where the judgment of the circuit court of Piatt county has been affirmed. The present writ of error is prosecuted from such judgment of affirmance. The declaration consists of three counts. The first and second counts charge that plaintiff in error made an assault upon defendant in error, and shot off a certain pistol, then and there loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, at and against the defendant in error, and thereby then and there shot and wounded defendant in error in so grievous a manner that his life was despaired of, etc. The third count charges that the plaintiff in error, having in his possession a certain pistol loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, so carelessly and negligently handled said pistol that the same, by the negligence and carelessness of plaintiff in error, was fired and shot off, by means whereof plaintiff in error, by his carelessness and negligence in handling said pistol, shot and wounded defendant in error in so grievous a manner that his life was despaired of, etc. The plaintiff in error filed several pleas, the first of which was, "Not guilty." The second plea averred that the defendant in error and plaintiff in error and a large number of other persons, at the residence of Daniel Hirsch, were engaged in a charivari of a young married couple, and that the defendant in error and the plaintiff in error, and other persons, with guns, revolvers, sleigh bells, and other instruments, were then and there wilfully disturbing the peace and quiet of the family of said Daniel Hirsch and of the neighborhood, by shooting guns, revolvers, pistols, ringing sleigh bells, blowing horns and other instruments, and that a revolver in the hands of plaintiff in error, by accident and without his will or fault or neglect, was discharged, by which the defendant in error, without the intention or neglect of the plaintiff in error, was injured, etc. The third plea was a plea of not guilty, signed by the guardian ad litem of the plaintiff in error. The fourth plea was a special plea of the guardian ad litem for plaintiff in error, and averred that defendant in error and plaintiff in error were together at the residence of Daniel Hirsch, engaged in a charivari, and that a revolver in the hands of plaintiff in error, by accident and without the will or fault of plaintiff in error, and while the barrel thereof was pointed in an opposite direction from the defendant in error, was discharged, by which the defendant in error, without the negligence or fault of the plaintiff in error, was injured.

The facts were substantially as follows: On February 2, 1898, defendant in error and plaintiff in error were attending school in De Land, Piatt county. Plaintiff in error lived at the home of his father, in the country, and defendant in error with his mother, in De Land. On the evening of that day there was a wedding at the residence of Daniel Hirsch, living about 2 miles from De Land. On the evening of that day some ten or twelve boys, including the parties to this suit, living in the neighborhood of De Land, met at the schoolhouse, pursuant to a previous arrangement, to engage in a charivari of a newly married couple at the house of Daniel Hirsch, living about a half mile distant from the schoolhouse. They took from the schoolhouse a bell, and provided themselves with bells, pans, plowshares, revolvers, and a shotgun, and other implements for making a noise. They reached Hirsch's home, in a body, between 9 and 10 o'clock. There, with a shotgun, revolvers, plowshares, sleigh bells, dinner bells, etc., they approached near the house, where the guns and pistols were discharged, and the other instruments were put in motion, and all the noise was made which they could make with such instruments. Considerable excitement and commotion were created in the house among the women. The hired man came to the gate of the yard, and asked them not to fire off firearms, as it would frighten the horses of the guests there hitched. Both defendant in error and plaintiff in error participated in this charivari, and were so engaged at the time the injury complained of was received by defendant in error. Plaintiff in error fired his pistol six times into the air over his head, then put in three more cartridges,—all the cartridges he had,—and then held the pistol above his head in his right hand, pointed upward, and pulled the trigger three times, but the last cartridge did not explode. While he was either in the act of bringing the pistol down, or unbreaching it, it exploded, and shot defendant in error in the face, near the eye. At this time Gilmore was about 2 feet east of the house, facing to the east. Fuller and Cathcart were about 10 feet east of the house, facing to the west, almost immediately in front of Gilmore, and were at the time engaged in ringing a strand of sleigh bells. The evidence of defendant in error tends to show that plaintiff in error took down his hand, and held the barrel in his left hand across his body,—the barrel pointing north,—and attempted to take out the shells, when the pistol was discharged. The appellate court, in its opinion, says: "There is a conflict in the testimony as to whether the explosion occurred while he [plaintiff in error] was bringing the revolver from the perpendicular position in which he had been holding it, or while he was making an effort to unbreach it with both hands at about the level of his waist." When defendant in error was wounded, he was at once taken into the house of Mr. Hirsch, and doctors were sent for, who treated the wound. The wound appears to have healed up, and, after being confined to the house on account of it for about a month, defendant in error again went to school, and also engaged in work as a clerk in some store in the town. The physicians probed for the bullet, but were unable to extract it. The medical experts seemed to differ in their opinion as to the nature and character of the wound, and its 60 L. R. A.

probable effect upon the general health of defendant in error. The evidence tends to show that defendant in error suffers pain when he attempts to read by lamplight, and when his eyes are exposed to the cold. It also appears that the wind causes his eye to moisten, and tears to come. There is some evidence tending to show that the bullet which struck defendant in error was a spent or deflected ball.

Where a party charged with an assault with intent to commit murder insists that the prosecuting witness was shot by accident, and it is proved that the shooting was done recklessly, regardless of the lives of others, the act of such party will be construed as implying general malice, rendering him amenable to the penalties of the law.

The evidence should never be withdrawn from the jury unless the testimony be of such conclusive character as to compel the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, to set aside the verdict in opposition to it.

Magruder, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the close of the evidence of the defendant in error, the plaintiff in error submitted a written instruction to the court, directing the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. This instruction was refused, and exception was taken to such refusal. At the close of all the testimony the plaintiff in error again made a motion to withdraw the evidence from the jury, and to instruct the jury to find for the plaintiff in error. A written instruction to this effect was refused by the court, and plaintiff in error took exception to such refusal. We are of the opinion that the instruction should have been given, upon the ground that the evidence does not tend to support a cause of action.

Section 56 of division 1 of the Criminal Code provides that "whoever wilfully disturbs the peace and quiet of any neighborhood or family, by loud or unusual noises, or by tumultuous or offensive carriage, threatening, traducing, quarreling, challenging to fight or fighting, or whoever shall carry concealed weapons, or in a threatening manner display any pistol, knife, slung-shot, brass, steel or iron knuckles, or other deadly weapon, shall be fined not exceeding $100." Section 60 of division 1 of the Criminal Code provides that "whoever wilfully interrupts or disturbs any school or other assembly of people, met for a lawful purpose, shall be fined not exceeding $100." 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 2d ed. pp. 1266, 1267. Unquestionably defendant in error and plaintiff in error were both engaged in wilfully disturbing the peace and quiet of the family of Daniel Hirsch by loud and unusual noises. The enterprise in which they were both engaged at the time of the injury was an unlawful one. The fact that it is called a "charivari" does not make it any the less unlawful. The assemblage around the house of Daniel Hirsch in the nighttime, there engaged in disturbing a family in which a wedding had occurred, was an unlawful and illegal assemblage, and not only so, but a gathering of illegal trespassers. They were all, including both plaintiff in error and defendant in error, engaged in the same unlawful enterprise. Defendant in error says that, he did not know that the plaintiff in error, Gilmore, had a revolver in his possession, before they went upon the premises of Hirsch; but his own testimony shows that, after they reached the premises of Hirsch, he saw the revolver in the possession of plaintiff in error, and saw and heard it fired off more than half a dozen times before he was wounded. After defendant in error witnessed the firing of the revolver by plaintiff in error, he still continued to join in the making of the noises which disturbed the family, and was, with another young man, named Cathcart, engaged in shaking a strand of sleigh bells.

Webster, in his dictionary, defines "charivari" as "a mock serenade of discordant noises, made with kettles, tin horns, etc., designed to annoy and insult." Worcester, in his dictionary, defines a charivari as "a vile or noisy music made with tin horns, bells, kettles, pans, etc., in derision of some person or event; a mock serenade." In Higgins v. Minaghan, 78 Wis. 602, 11 L. R. A. 138, 47 N. W. 941, which was an action for damages brought for the shooting of the plaintiff in the leg while he and others were giving the defendant a charivari, the plaintiff's counsel, on the voir dire, was permitted to ask, against the objection of the defendant, whether the jurors had any prejudice for or against charivari parties, or entertained any prejudice against parties that engaged in a charivari; and the supreme court of Wisconsin there said: "The learned circuit judge seems to have had some doubt about the propriety of this course of examination, and we think it was wholly wrong. Every good, law-abiding citizen must and does condemn such unlawful and riotous assemblies. They are wholly indefensible in law and morals, and are reprobated by every well-disposed person. With the same propriety a juror called upon to try a man charged with a criminal act might be asked if he had or entertained any bias or prejudice for or against crime or criminals. . . . We do not understand that a prejudice entertained by a juror against a particular crime constitutes a sufficient ground for excluding him when called to try a person for such offense. . . . It would be almost impossible to obtain a panel in a case if every citizen was excluded from it who had a prejudice against or was opposed to charivari, which is, in law, a crime." In the same case it is also said: "The charivari parties, consisting of the crowd in front of or upon the defendant's premises, constituted an unlawful assembly, and by their transactions, conduct, and behavior became what is known in the law as a 'riot,' tending to the disturbance of the peace, and the annoyance, if not the terror, of the defendant and others in the vicinity; they were trespassers in the highway. . . . The rioters themselves knew, or should have known, that their acts and conduct about the house in the night were well calculated to produce terror and fright, and injuriously affect the defendant's family. . . . Here the rioters were firing guns, blowing horns, drumming on pans, and making all kinds of hideous noises," etc.

in error and plaintiff in error were both engaged in such an unlawful and criminal enterprise as is above described? In Harris v. Hatfield, 71 Ill. 298, a suit was brought to recover damages on account of disease communicated to the cattle of plaintiff by Texas cattle brought into this state by defendant in the month of July in violation of a statute forbidding such act, it appearing that the plaintiff had put his cattle, among which were the Texas cattle, into his own pasture; that soon afterward the plaintiff discovered that some of them were Texas cattle, and still kept the possession and control of them, and bought some of them, and kept them with his other cattle; and it was there held that a court of justice will not assist a party who has participated in a transaction forbidden by statute to assert rights growing out of it, or to relieve himself from the consequences of his own illegal act. The principle is thus concisely stated in Heland v. Lowell, 3 Allen, 407, 81 Am. Dec. 670: "And it is the established law that, when a plaintiff's own unlawful act concurs in causing the damage that he complains of, he cannot recover compensation for such damage." In Frye v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 73 Ill. 399, we said: "The rule is well settled that, if a party suffers injury whilst violating a public law, the other party being also a transgressor, he cannot recover for the injury, if his unlawful act was the cause of the injury. The party bringing the cattle to the state may have violated the law. Appellants were no less transgressors, and the maxim, In pari delicto melior est conditio defendentis, must apply. In Harris v. Hatfield, 71 Ill. 298, similar views were expressed." See also, Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Beggs, 85 Ill. 80, 28 Am. Rep. 613; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Brooks, 81 Ill. 245; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Michie, 83 Ill. 427. As long ago as the case of Holman v. Johnson, 1 Cowp. 343, Lord Mansfield said: "The principle of public policy is this: Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act." In Hall v. Corcoran, 107 Mass. 253, 9 Am. Rep. 30, it was said by the supreme court of Massachusetts: "The general principle is undoubted that courts of justice will not assist a person who has participated in a transaction forbidden by statute to assert rights growing out of it, or to relieve himself from the consequences of his own illegal act. Whether the form of the action is in contract or in tort, the test in each case is whether, when all the facts are disclosed, the action appears to be founded in a violation of law, in which the plaintiff has taken part." Way v. Foster, 1 Allen, 408; Smith v. Boston & M. R. Co. 120 Mass. 490, 21 Am. Rep. 538; Wallace v. Cannon, 38 Ga. 199, 95 Am. Dec. 385; Scott v. Duffy, 14 Pa. 20; Devor v. Knauer, 84 Ill. App. 184; Holt v. Green, 73 Pa. 198, 13 Am. Rep. 737; De Groot v. Van Duzer, 20 Wend. 406; Coppell v. Hall, 7 Wall. 558, 19 L. ed. 244.

The same doctrine is laid down in the text-books. Beach, in his work on Contributory Negligence, 3d ed. § 47, says: "When the plaintiff is obliged to lay the foundation of his action in his own violation of law, he cannot recover. And when his illegal act also contributes to produce the injury of which he complains, he has no action, unless the defendant acted wantonly." Cooley, in his work on Torts, 2d ed. *151, says: "A further illustration of the rule which refuses redress to one participating in a wrong may be had where two persons are engaged in the same unlawful enterprise or action, and in prosecuting it one is injured by the negligence of the other." The reasoning of the latter author is that, when the party injured undertakes to trace his injury to the negligence of the other, he shows that at the time he was himself engaged in an unlawful action, and that it was only because of such action that the opportunity was afforded for the negligent injury. The author then says: "The injury, therefore, is as directly traceable to his own breach of the law as to the negligence of his associate; each has combined to produce it, and without both it could not have occurred. What the plaintiff must ask, therefore, must be this: That the law shall relieve him from the consequences of his disregard of the law, and this, as already stated, it will refuse to do." So in the case at bar the defendant in error traces his injury to the negligence of the plaintiff in error, but in doing so he necessarily shows that at the time both he and the plaintiff in error were engaged in the unlawful enterprise of disturbing the peace and quiet of the family of Hirsch by loud and unusual noises, and by the firing of revolvers and a shotgun. Because of the engagement jointly and together of both plaintiff in error and defendant in error in the criminal charivari, an opportunity was afforded for the injury complained of. Therefore the injury was as much due to the breach of the law by the defendant in error as to the negligence of his associate, the plaintiff in error. Both the plaintiff in error and the defendant in error combined to produce the injury. It follows that defendant in error cannot be relieved by the law from the consequences of his own disregard of the law.

The evidence shows that there was an organization among these young men for the purpose of carrying into effect the unlawful charivari. Defendant in error testifies that he was the first to reach the schoolhouse on the evening in question, and that his associates kept coming in, one or two at a time, until the whole party had arrived, including the plaintiff in error. A common purpose to participate in the unlawful transaction was thereby shown. Greenleaf, in his work on Evidence, vol. 1, § 111, says: "The connection of the individuals in the unlawful enterprise being thus shown, every act and declaration of each member of the confederacy in pursuance of the original concerted plan, and with reference to the common object, is, in contemplation of law, the act and declaration of them all. . . . It makes no difference at what time anyone entered into the conspiracy. Every one who does enter into a common purpose or design is generally deemed, in law, a party to every act which had before been done by the others, and a party to every act which may afterwards be done by any of the others in furtherance of such common design." In Higgins v. Minaghan, 78 Wis. 602, 11 L. R. A. 138, 47 N. W. 941, the same doctrine was recognized that where a party is present as an actual participant in a charivari, and aids and encourages the others, he is responsible for the acts, language, and conduct of each and every one constituting the charivari party, the same as if such acts were done by himself. It follows that the firing of the pistol by the plaintiff in error was as much the act of the defendant in error as of any other person engaged in the enterprise. The fact that the parties assembled at the schoolhouse were associated in the joint prosecution of the common design gave to the collective body the attribute of individuality by their mutual agreement, and the act of each member in furtherance of the common object was the act of all concerned. Under this view, to allow defendant in error to recover in this case would be to allow him to recover for an injury which was, in the eye of the law, as much his own act as the act of the plaintiff in error.

It is said, however, by the defendant in error, that the trial court gave, in behalf of the plaintiff in error, the instructions which he asked, embodying the view above stated. It is true that the court instructed the jury that whosoever wilfully disturbs the peace and quiet of any neighborhood or family by loud or unusual noises is, under the laws of this state, guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine on conviction thereof. The court also instructed the jury, in behalf of plaintiff in error, that if they should believe from the evidence "that, at the time of the injury complained of, the plaintiff and defendant, with others, were engaged in an unlawful enterprise or action, and in prosecuting such unlawful enterprise the plaintiff was unintentionally injured by the negligence of the defendant, then the plaintiff cannot recover for any injury received under such circumstances, while so unlawfully engaged." But the court gave twenty-five instructions in behalf of defendant in error, which ignored entirely the unlawful character of the enterprise in which these parties were engaged, and which based the responsibility of the plaintiff in error for negligence in the handling of his pistol, resulting in the injury to defendant in error, upon the supposition that none of the parties participating in the charivari were engaged in an unlawful transaction. The court used the following language in instruction numbered 23, given for the defendant in error, to wit: "The court instructs the jury that a charivari, so called, is not in itself unlawful." This instruction was not only incorrect as a statement of the law, but it was directly contradictory of the instructions heretofore referred to, given in behalf of the defendant. In instruction 19 given in behalf of the defendant in error, the court said: "The lawfulness of the act from which the injury resulted is no excuse for the negligence," etc. In the same instruction the court also said: "The court further instructs the jury that, although you may find the defendant was in the exercise of a lawful right, yet he is bound to use such reasonable diligence and precaution that no injury may be done to others." Clearly, these instructions thus given for the defendant in error were erroneous in holding that plaintiff in error was engaged in the exercise of a lawful right while participating in the charivari. The instructions above referred to, given for plaintiff in error, tended to make the impression upon the minds of the jury that the charivari was an unlawful transaction, while all the instructions of the defendant in error, including those herein referred to, tended to make the impression upon the minds of the jury that the charivari was not an unlawful transaction. "Where the instructions set up for the jury contradictory rules for their guidance, which are unexplained, and following either of which would or might lead to different results, then the instructions are inherently defective, and calculated to confuse and mislead the jury." Blashfield, Instructions to Jurors, § 73; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Payne, 49 Ill. 499; Quinn v. Donovan, 85 Ill. 194.

In the first and second counts of the declaration an assault is charged against plaintiff in error. "The intention to do harm is of the essence of an assault." 2 Greenl. Ev. 16th ed. § 83; 1 Hilliard, Torts, 3d ed. §§ 7-9, p. 181; Paxon v. Boyer, 67 Ill. 132, 16 Am. Rep. 615; Razor v. Kinsley, 55 Ill. App. 605; Kennedy v. People, 122 Ill. 649, 13 N. E. 213. In the case at bar there is no evidence in the record tending in the slightest degree to prove that plaintiff in error intended to do any harm to the defendant in error, or that the wound inflicted upon the defendant in error was in any way intentional or wilful. The sole ground upon which it is sought to base a right of recovery is that the plaintiff in error was careless and negligent in the handling of the revolver, which caused the injury to the defendant in error. In view of this absence of intention or wilfulness on the part of the plaintiff in error, he asked the court to instruct the jury to find for him upon the first and second counts of the declaration, but the instructions so asked were refused. We are of the opinion that the instructions to find for the defendant upon the first and second counts should have been given, and that it was error to refuse them.

The judgments of the Appellate Court and of the Circuit Court of Piatt County are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the latter court, with directions to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed. 60 L. R. A.

Gustav F. REIMERS et al.

(200 Ill. 386.)

1. The sale of the good will of a business and the personal property used in conducting it, upon which appears the name of the seller, will not prevent him from resuming business under his own name.
2. One who has sold the good will of a business to persons who change the name under which it is conducted has a right, upon resuming business under the old name, to have mail directed to such name delivered to him.
3. One who sells a trade, good will, and business, covenanting to warrant and defend the same, cannot, after resuming business, solicit trade from his former customers to the injury of the buyer.
4. One who sells and warrants the good will of a business, a large part of the orders of which come by telephone, cannot, upon resuming business, appropriate the old telephone number to the injury of the buyer.

(December 16, 1902.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court for the Second District, affirming a decree of the Circuit Court for Will County in plaintiffs' favor in a suit to enjoin violation of the implied warranty in a sale of the good will of a business. Affirmed in part. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. E. Meers and C. W. Brown for appellant.

Messrs. Donahoe & McNaughton, for appellees:

It is not necessary, in order to give a right to an injunction, that a specific trademark should be infringed; but it is sufficient that the court is satisfied that there is an intent on the part of the defendant to palm off her goods as the goods of the complainants.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From the year 1885 until his death, in 1891, John Ranft conducted a business of manufacturing and selling ginger ale, orange cider, lemon sour, and other like drinks, and bottling beer, under the name of Ranft Bottling Works, at No. 229 North Bluff street, in Joliet. Upon his death he left as his successor in the business his widow, Auguste Ranft, the appellant, who conducted the business from that time under the name of A.

Ranft Bottling Works. She was the sole proprietor of the business up to July 1, 1900. The trade name "A. Ranft Bottling Works," together with the letters "A. R." and the word "Trademark," were blown in the bottles used by her, and the billheads, stationery, and wagons, were marked "A. Ranft Bottling House," or "A. Ranft Bottling Works, Mrs. A. Ranft, Proprietor." On July 1, 1900, Gustav Reimers, one of the appellees, and brother of appellant, bought a one-half interest in the business, and they conducted it under the partnership name of "A. Ranft & Co.," but the marks on the bottles, stationery, and wagons remained the same. On July 15, 1901, the appellee Reimers sold out his interest to appellant, and the partnership was dissolved. After the dissolution, appellant prosecuted the business under the same name and in the same manner as before the partnership. She leased the premises where the business was carried on; and in the latter part of July, 1901, appellees, who had formed a partnership to go into the same business, purchased the premises, and called upon appellant to see if she would sell the machinery, property, and business to them. The negotiations resulted in an agreement by which she was to sell the property and business to them for $6,000 at the end of the month of August. In pursuance of that understanding, appellant executed a bill of sale to appellees on August 31, 1901, of the following property: "All property and machinery now used in connection with the manufacture and bottling of pop, beer, etc., at the premises known as No. 229 North Bluff street, in the city of Joliet, Illinois, including about three hundred cases of pop bottles, fifty cases quart bottles, thirty cases siphon bottles (including all cases), six horses, four wagons, one top buggy, two sets double harness, four sets single harness, two bobsleds, one safe, one desk, a lot of extracts, all tools in barn used in connection with said manufactory, as well as the trade, good will, and business of said party of the first part at said described premises." The property was delivered, and from that time appellees carried on the business. They changed the sign over the door to read, "Reimers & Voitik Bottling House." They used the old bottles and wagons with the former name on them, but as they purchased new bottles they put on the words "Reimers & Voitik Bottling Works, Joliet, Ill.," and the initials "R. V.," and "Trademark." Shortly afterward appellant set up the same kind of business at No. 117 North Bluff street, about 600 feet from the former location. The business sold to appellees had been largely done through mail and telephone orders, and the telephone used in the premises was No. 1,343. Appellant directed the telephone company to install on her premises said telephone No. 1,343, and she directed the mail for the Ranft Bottling Works to be delivered to her. She procured bottles with the words "Ranft Bottling Works," and the letters "A. R." in the form of a monogram, and "Trademark," blown in them, and on her wagons she placed the sign, "A. Ranft Bottling Works, Telephone 1,343." Appellees thereupon filed the bill in this case in the circuit court of Will county, praying for an injunction against appellant from using the tradename "Ranft Bottling Works," or any similar name, or the trademark "A. R.," in connection with her business; also from using the telephone number 1,343, or receiving mail matter addressed to "Ranft Bottling Works," or soliciting trade and custom of those who were customers and patrons of the business at the time of the sale. The bill was answered, and upon a hearing the court granted the relief prayed for, except as to the receipt of mail addressed to "Ranft Bottling Works." An appeal was taken to the appellate court for the second district, and one of the justices of that court having heard the case in the circuit court, and the others being divided in opinion, the decree was affirmed by operation of law.

It has been held that the right of a man to use his own name in connection with his own business is so fundamental that the intention to entirely divest himself of such right, and transfer it to another, will not readily be presumed, but must be clearly shown. Where it is so shown, the transaction will be upheld, but it will not be sustained upon doubtful or uncertain proof. Hazleton Boiler Co. v. Hazleton Tripod Boiler Co. 142 Ill. 494, 30 N. E. 339. In this case there was no agreement that complainants should have the right to use the name of the defendant, or the name in which the business was carried on, or that she should not use it. She testified (and it was not contradicted) that in selling complainants the bottles, cases, and wagons, she agreed that they might keep the then existing names on them, but when they bought new ones, or when the wagons were painted, they should not put the names on again. Furthermore, complainants did not assume the name which they sought to enjoin defendant from using, but substituted their own. They changed the sign on the building, and, as they bought new bottles, put on the new name and initials. Their counsel now say that they never insisted upon the right to use the name of the appellant. They do not claim that they acquired any right to its use under the contract. When the defendant established her new business under the name of "A. Ranft Bottling Works," complainants had changed the name of their business; and she had never divested herself of the right to use her name, or transferred it to them. There was no agreement on the part of defendant that she would not again engage in the business in Joliet or elsewhere. After the agreement for the purchase was made, and before the bill of sale was executed, complainants heard some rumor that she was intending to again engage in business; and they testified that they conferred with her about it, and she told them that she was tired of the business, and wanted to get out of it, and had no intention of resuming it. She denied that she 60 L. R. A.

had any such conversation with them, but they all testified that complainants asked defendant to sign an agreement that she would not go into the business again, and she would not give them any answer. No agreement of that kind was made or signed, and the bill of sale was subsequently executed without any stipulation of that character. In fact, it is not claimed that defendant was in any manner prohibited from re-engaging in the same business in Joliet, or that complainants had any right to restrain her from doing so; and the bill did not ask for an injunction against her conducting a new business at No. 117 North Bluff street, but only to prevent her from using the name "A. Ranft Bottling Works" or "Ranft Bottling Works" in such business. If the complainants have any right to any relief in this suit, it rests wholly upon the purchase of certain specific articles of personal property, with the name "A. Ranft Bottling Works" on them, together with the good will of the business carried on at No. 229 North Bluff street. It is not contended that the mere sale of the property and good will, without any agreement not to resume the same business, would prevent the defendant from again establishing the same business in Joliet; and this is in accordance with the authorities. That being so, and there being no agreement that the defendant should not use her own name, we think, under the authority of Hazleton Boiler Co. v. Hazleton Tripod Boiler Co. 142 Ill. 494, 30 N. E. 339, complainants had no right to an injunction against the use of the name or the words in question. Defendant had a right to the use of it, and complainants had changed the name of their business, so that there was no wrong in her directing the mail for Ranft Bottling Works to be delivered to her. There was no artifice or deception used by the defendant to mislead the public into the supposition that she was continuing the same business which she had sold to complainants, and there was no concealment of the fact that she was established in a new location. So far as the mail is concerned, there was no attempt to deceive or defraud the public by obtaining letters or trade intended for the complainants.

The business had been carried on for many years at No. 229 North Bluff street, and was well established in that location. The place had a good trade, and the good will was a large part of the consideration for the purchase. The visible property was probably not worth half the purchase price. The defendant covenanted to warrant and defend the property sold to complainants, together with this good will; and it was charged and proved that she had interfered with such good will by canvassing among those who were customers of the business when she sold it, and soliciting their trade, with the purpose and effect of largely destroying the value of that which she had sold for a valuable consideration. In England it seems to be settled that the vendor of a good will is not entitled to canvass customers and solicit them not to deal with the purchaser, but to deal with the vendor. Trego v. Hunt [1896] A. C. 7. The vendor will be restrained from such conduct by injunction. In this country the authorities are not agreed. In some states it is held that the purchase of a good will does not carry with it any obligation not to lessen its value by interference with it unless there is an express agreement to that effect, provided the vendor does not hold himself out to the public as continuing the business which he has sold. In these states the seller may set up the same business in the same vicinity, and canvass the customers of the house, with the effect of destroying the good will. The English view, which we are inclined to regard as the more just and equitable, is adopted by other authorities. Myers v. Kalamazoo Buggy Co. 54 Mich. 215, 52 Am. Rep. 811, 19 N. W. 961, 20 N. W. 545; Newark Coal Co. v. Spangler, 54 N. J. Eq. 354, 34 Atl. 932. We do not think that the defendant ought to be allowed, after selling and warranting a good will to the complainants, to purposely endeavor to prevent their receiving the benefit of it, or to attempt to disturb them in its enjoyment. The locality chosen by her was not near enough to have that effect. But to canvass old customers of the firm, and endeavor to dissuade them from continuing to deal with complainants, was a direct interference with the property which defendant sold, with the purpose of destroying it and preventing complainants having the benefit and advantage of it. The attempt to appropriate the telephone number which had been used in the business sold, and by which a large part of the orders had been accustomed to come, was of the same character.

We conclude that the decree was too broad, in restraining the defendant from the use of the name "A. Ranft Bottling Works" or "Ranft Bottling Works," but that it was justified as to the attempt to appropriate the telephone and telephone number, and as to soliciting trade and custom of the patrons and customers of the business sold by her to the complainants at the time of the sale.

The judgment of the Appellate Court and the decree of the Circuit Court are therefore reversed so far as relates to the use of said name or words, and the judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed in all other respects. The cause is remanded to the Circuit Court. Appellant and appellees will each pay one half of the costs of the appeal.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

Telitha Dean KARREN

v.

Fred W. KARREN.

(.....Utah.....)

1. A woman who consented to a decree of divorce against her to enable her husband to obtain a grant of property cannot, after her husband had married another woman, have the decree annulled, although, in consideration of her consent, he promised to marry her after the grant was procured, and the decree was obtained by suppression of facts, and false testimony.

2. Under a statute permitting changes in divorce decrees in respect to disposal of children or distribution of property, such changes can only be made in the action in which the divorce is granted.

I. Scope.

The primary object of this note is to collate all cases where the party obtaining, or actually consenting to, a divorce decree has afterwards attempted to question it, though cases showing an attempt by the defendant to question a decree collusively obtained are also necessarily included on account of their close relation to consent decrees. But cases of constructive consent, 60 L. R. A.

based upon subsequent recognition or acquiescence by acts in the decree, are excluded, as are also all cases in which the party attacking the decree did not actually consent thereto, and had been in no way instrumental in obtaining it, but was denied relief because of long delay in questioning the validity of the decree, which is treated by some of the courts as in the nature of a constructive consent by acquiescence.

II. Direct attack by party obtaining it.

a. In general.

The only authority found for a direct application by the party obtaining a divorce to have the same set aside as a matter of right or privilege, without an allegation of fraud, mistake, or surprise, is Ficener v. Ficener 8 Ky. L. Rep. 867, 3 S. W. 597. There, a wife obtained a divorce a vinculo, and, at the same term, a few days after, it was set aside at her instance, leaving the parties still husband and wife. This was done without notice to the husband, who afterwards came in and moved to set aside the order by which the judgment for divorce was set aside, which motion was not granted, the court stating that, after the term at which a judgment for divorce has been rendered it becomes final, the grounds for setting aside ordinary judgments at law or in equity not applying to CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the District Court for Cache County in plaintiff's favor for a part of the relief demanded in an action to set aside a judgment granting a divorce; plaintiff appealing from so much of the decree as refused to set aside the divorce in toto, and defendant appealing from so much as awarded any relief. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. George Q. Rich and J. Z. Stewart, Jr., for appellant:

The action to set aside the divorce proceedings on the ground of fraud would, of course, be a direct attack, because fraud does not render a judgment or decree void, but voidable, and a voidable decree cannot be collaterally attacked.

mer v. Knoyle, 43 Kan. 338, 23 Pac. 487; Oaswell v. Oaswell, 120 Ill. 377, 11 N. E. 344.

The misrepresentations relied upon in the complaint in this action do not constitute fraud, because they do not possess the elements, and are mere promises for the future which respondent had no right to rely upon.

Bertrand*, 14 Ark. 267; Kil-born v. Field, 78 Pa. 194; Blank v. Nohl (Mo.) 19 S. W. 65; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Singer v. Singer, 41 Barb.

judgments for divorce; but that during the term, however, and while the condition of both parties remains unchanged, there is no reason why the judgment may not be set aside at the instance of the complaining party, who may have relented in his desire that the separation be final. But the court said that the order in this case should not have been made without notice to the husband, and that, if he had persevered in his attempt to have the order set aside on that ground, it would have been done, and the wife would have been required to give some reason for setting aside the decree.

In the remaining decisions the courts uniformly refuse to grant relief, for various reasons, according to the circumstances.

In Merritt v. Lockwood, 45 Hun, 592, 10 N. Y. S. R. 875, a wife brought an action for absolute divorce, obtaining a decree which allowed her nothing for her support, and, after remaining quiet for twelve years and until after her husband's death, she brought an action to set aside the decree for fraud consisting in a failure to allow her alimony. The court denied her any relief, stating, however, that, had she objected at once and applied to open the decree, the application would have been natural; but that a delay of twelve years, and until after her husband was dead, afforded abundant grounds to deny the application.

It clearly appears that when complainant has been guilty of fraud or bad faith no relief may be expected.

So, in Ferry v. Ferry, 9 Wash. 239, 37 Pac. 481, an action to annul a divorce decree granted the petitioner upon a cross-complaint, on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the court on account of nonresidence of complainant therein, the court refused relief, stating that no one was deceived or defrauded in this instance unless it was the court, and that the same court will not set aside a decree thus rendered at the suit of one who is responsible for the imposition effected,—especially after more than three years of acquiescence and enjoyment of the fruits of the action; that "courts cannot be used that way."

And in Carlisle v. Carlisle, 96 Mich. 128, 55 N. W. 673, it is said, arguendo, that a decree cannot be avoided by a party guilty of fraud; nor can one who obtains a divorce, and accepts its benefits, afterwards question the jurisdiction of the court granting it.

So, in Simons v. Simons, 47 Mich. 253, 10 N. W. 360, the complainant in a divorce action filed a bill to set the decree aside, alleging that it was procured by collusion with her husband, while in her original bill for the divorce there was a sworn allegation that it was not founded upon any collusion, agreement, or understanding whatever. The court held that, without this sworn allegation in her bill of complaint, it would not have been entertained, and, having thus given the court jurisdiction, and permitted the case to proceed to a final decree, she could not then be permitted to take advantage of her own wrong. In the language of the court: "Indeed, the whole matter was simply a shameless bargain, and, whether right or wrong, she must now abide by it."

If the decree, as it stands, is the result of carelessness or negligence in the complainant, no relief can be obtained by that party, although the question of his fraud or bad faith is not involved. On this principle, in Champion v. Woods, 79 Cal. 17, 21 Pac. 534, relief was denied to a wife, who, having obtained a decree of divorce on a complaint containing an allegation that there was no community property, two years later, and subsequent to her husband's death, instituted proceedings against his executor asking to have the decree in the divorce case canceled so far as the same affected her property rights, and that she be adjudged to be the owner of one half of property which she claimed was community property, on the ground that the statement in regard to community property contained in her petition for the original decree was induced by the representations of her husband, on whom she implicitly relied in regard to this matter, and that such representations were false and fraudulent. The court said that plaintiff's relations with her husband at the time of the divorce proceedings were such that it was negligence and inexcusable carelessness on her part to rely upon him in a matter of so much importance.

Neither may a complainant have relief against a decree when he expressly consented to the provisions of which he afterwards complains. This is clearly shown in Rindge v. Rindge, 22 Ind. 31, where, after the granting of a divorce decree at the suit of the husband for incompatibility of temper, adjudging that defendant be given certain property as alimony as previously agreed by the parties, the complainant at the same term moved for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence which would give him a divorce against his wife on the ground of adultery, and also alleging fraud upon her part on account of which the property so adjudged her was obtained; but the court overruled the motion, stating that, although a woman against whom a divorce is obtained on the ground of adultery is not entitled to alimony, here, however, the divorce had been obtained on other grounds; also, that the property so adjudged her was given by the court at

If the intention of F. W. Karren was to secure the property through fraud, respondent was equally guilty with him because, according to her complaint, it was in sole reliance upon these representations, and to enable him to procure the deed by those means, that she "neglected and failed to appear." No relief will be granted in such cases.

If a party has joined in obtaining a void decree, he cannot set up its invalidity against the other party, if such other party has married again relying on the divorce. Stewart, Marr. & Div. § 419; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 344.

In all cases great caution will be exercised, especially if the rights of third persons have intervened, or one party, relying upon the divorce, has remarried.

Stewart, Marr. & Div. § 423; 2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 751.

In an action to set aside a divorce no alimony will be granted.

Messrs. Nathan Tanner, Jr., and J. N. Kimball, for respondent:

The decree of divorce should be set aside the plaintiff's instance, in pursuance of an agreement between the parties, and, whether such agreement was a proper one the court expressly states that it is not called upon to decide, only holding that, as plaintiff voluntarily agreed to suffer the decree for the property to go against him, his motion for a new trial should be refused.

b. Attempt by wife to vacate decree obtained in her name without her consent.

Decrees obtained by the husband in the wife's name without her knowledge or consent are vacated as being a fraud both upon her and upon the court.

Such a decree was vacated in Olmstead v. Olmstead, 41 Minn. 297, 43 N. W. 67, where the wife knew nothing of the proceedings until she heard of the granting of the decree, except that, in an interview had with her husband and while laboring under great excitement and distress, she had signed a paper without knowledge of its contents, which, after the decree was granted, she believed must have been the verification to the complaint. The court granted the application to vacate the decree, stating that it could not be tolerated that a party anxious to secure a divorce should bring about a judicial separation by an action against himself and commenced and managed by himself in his own interest, using his wife as a mere figurehead,—a fraud alike upon her and the court. In this case the husband had remarried within ten days after the entry of the decree; but the court said that parties who in such cases make haste to contract another marriage take the risk of the consequences of an appeal or other proceedings to vacate the judgment.

And in Brown v. Grove, 116 Ind. 84, 18 N. E. 887, a wife was given relief, after her husband's death, from a decree procured by him in her name without her knowledge or consent, the court stating that a husband who procures a petition to be filed in the name of his wife against himself without her knowledge, and answers the complaint filed by his own procurement, perpetrates a fraud upon her and upon the court; that the court abhors such conduct, and has inherent power to annul such a decree.

In Bradford v. Abend, 89 Ill. 78, 31 Am. Rep. 67, upon vacating a decree in a suit instituted by a husband against himself in his wife's name while she was insane and confined in an asylum in another state, the court gave as its reason that, being insane, the wife could not consent to the granting of the decree, and, also, that fraud would be presumed from the unequal position of the parties, whether any existed or not, and that, alone, would vitiate the decree. 60 L. R. A.

III. Application by both parties to set aside decree.

After an absolute decree of divorce had been granted and entered, both parties joined in a petition asking that the decree be vacated and the parties restored to their former rights and privileges. This relief the court granted, no third person being injured thereby, and it appearing upon the affidavit of complainant in the divorce action that charges against defendant made therein were, after the rendition of the decree, found to be untrue. This order, however, was expressly made without prejudice to the property rights which third persons might have acquired under the decree, and which the court stated must be protected. Colvin v. Colvin, 2 Paige, 385, 22 Am. Dec. 644.

IV. Direct attack by party who has consented to, or colluded in, its procurement.

a. Consent.

In Brick v. Brick, 65 Mich. 230, 31 N. W. 907, 33 N. W. 761, a defendant in a divorce suit appealed from a decree in plaintiff's favor, but, the printed record showing that the decree was entered upon the consent of defendant through his solicitor, the court held that it was binding upon the parties unless impeached for fraud or mistake.

It is said in the course of the opinion in Scott v. Scott, 17 Ind. 309, that, under the general chancery practice, in suits for divorce, a default, acknowledgment, or consent, by a defendant, was generally supposed to settle the case against him, so that he could not afterwards complain of any lawful disposition the court should make of the case.

And a wife who entered her appearance in a suit for divorce instituted by her husband, consented to a default, and accepted a certain sum of money as alimony, was held in Mahe v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. 95 Ill. App. 365, to be bound by the decree upon attempting to have it set aside ten months later on the ground of fraud, where the husband had contracted a second marriage with a woman who, in good faith, had relied upon the validity of the divorce decree, although the wife's consent was obtained and the acceptance of the alimony induced by the coercion of her husband, and her inaction for the ten months succeeding the divorce, during which time she was living with her husband as his wife, was induced by his repeated assurances that the decree was fraudulent and had no effect upon their relations and by his promise to remarry her in order to allay her fears. The decision is based upon the ground that the wife, in its entirety, because it appears from the findings that it was procured by default, which default was caused, and the respondent prevented from presenting a good and sufficient defense, by reason of appellant's misrepresentations to her; that it was also obtained upon testimony knowingly false, thus constituting a fraud upon the respondent, a fraud upon the court, and a crime against the laws of the state.

2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. §§ 744, 753; Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 46 Iowa, 437; Rush v. Rush, 46 Iowa, 648, 26 Am. Rep. 179; Johnson v. Coleman, 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. Dec. 193; Freeman, Judgm. 99, 100, 250, 489, 491.

The fact of his remarriage should make no difference.

knowing all that time that the decree was fraudulent, was barred from any relief against it by reason of her failing to defend, and delaying proceedings to vacate the decree until an innocent woman had become involved; and that, although she herself was deeply wronged, since one of two innocent parties must suffer, she who placed it in the power of her husband to commit the fraud must be the one. The court, however, stated that, had the question been one between the petitioner and her husband alone, and had the rights of an innocent third party not intervened, it would have no hesitancy in holding that, under all the circumstances, the petitioner might be entitled to relief, notwithstanding her failure to make defense to the divorce suit and her delay in filing her bill. To this decision there is a dissenting opinion to the effect that, it appearing that the plaintiff's acts in regard to the granting of the divorce were induced by the power and compulsion of her husband, and her inaction after its rendition being caused by his influence and her reliance on him, she ought not to be refused relief in order to save an innocent party, as her claims are grounded upon the fraud practised by the husband on the court, and a refusal to grant her relief involves a support of the fraud and a permitting of it to succeed. Although the wife's consent to the divorce proceedings is recognized as one of the grounds for refusing her any relief, the force of the decision as to this question is weakened by the greater prominence given to the other ground of laches.

But a wife was allowed, in Megarge v. Megarge, 2 N. Y. Week. Dig. 352, to vacate by motion a decree of absolute divorce rendered against her on the charge of adultery, where it appeared that the parties, mutually desiring a divorce, applied to an attorney and made arrangements to secure a decree on the ground of abandonment, and that the wife supposed the decree was granted on that ground, and therefore made no defense; but, by means of manufactured evidence, an absolute decree was fraudulently rendered against her on the ground of adultery. This case is of value here only by reason of the fact that no point was made against the wife on account of her consent. The relief was granted wholly on the ground of the fraud practised on her, the judge stating that courts have always intervened on motion to vindicate their own process and proceedings against oppressive, fraudulent, and collusive uses of them.

A year after the entry of a decree of divorce procured without the wife's knowledge and upon irregular and defective service, she gave her son power to employ counsel and either obtain a favorable settlement of her share of the property. 60 L. R. A.

Baskin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The material allegations of the complaint are as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, on the 17th day of September, 1900, in this [first district] court, a decree and judgment was entered in an action wherein said defendant was plaintiff, and this plaintiff was defendant, in terms dissolving the bonds of matrimony between this plaintiff and said defendant, and awarding said defendant the three children, issue of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant, viz.: . . . And plaintiff further alleges that the summons in said action was never served upon her, and that she had no legal knowledge of the pendency of said action; that said judgment was rendered against her by default, and upon a complaint" which charged her (the defendant) with having been guilty erty, or set the decree of divorce aside. Upon a favorable settlement being obtained by the son, another decree was entered ratifying the original decree. After fifteen years, during which she had enjoyed the property obtained on the settlement and after the husband had married again, she commenced an action to set aside the decree on the ground of its invalidity, claiming that she was not fully and accurately advised as to her rights at the time of the previous transactions, and was now informed by counsel that said decrees of divorcement were wholly and utterly void. The court denied her right to contest the validity of the decree on the following grounds, viz.: That in the previous transactions it appeared that she clothed her son fully by oral directions, with the power which he exercised, and was fully aware of every step that he was about to take; also that, after the matter was concluded, she was fully informed of everything that had been done, and expressed her satisfaction with it, and that whether the first decree was valid or not, the second was a confirmation of it made with her consent; also, that the only misapprehension as to her rights under which she labored was a mistake of law caused by error in the judgment of her counsel and corrected in no other way than by the judgment of other counsel fifteen years afterwards, and that, as to such a mistake of law, equity will not grant relief; further, that, by receiving and enjoying the proceeds of the settlement, and by delaying to have the judgment of record set aside until a new family had grown up under its protection, she was estopped, both by confirmation and by acquiescence or laches. De Horeu v. Hereu (Ariz.) 56 Pac. 871.

Although a wife, at the time out of the state, signed an admission of personal service of the summons and complaint in divorce proceedings, and waived all other service, she was allowed to set aside the decree subsequently obtained upon her nonappearance for the reason that such service would not avail to give the court jurisdiction where the statute prescribed service by publication upon parties without the state, and the contention that she was estopped to question the decree by her admission of service was held to be of no force, since she could not waive the order of publication required by statute, except by entering her appearance, or causing it to be entered by her attorney. Weatherbee v. Weatherbee, 20 Wis. 499.

b. Collusion.

From the statement in the early case of Prudam v. Phillips, further reported infra, V. b, that, "if both parties colluded in the cheat upon the court, it was never known that either of of adultery. "And that, after the commission of the adultery complained of in the complaint (in said action for divorce), the said defendant forgave her, and lived with and cohabited with her as his wife, and so lived and cohabited with her during the pendency of the action aforesaid, and thereafter left her in possession and custody of their home and children while he went to fill a mission in the Southern states. And she further alleges that the said defendant represented to her and told her that he was procuring said divorce because of the insistence of his parents, and that after said divorce was procured he would remarry her, and provide for her as he had hitherto done, and under no circumstances deprive her of the custody of the said children, or of the homestead on which they then resided. That, at the time of the bringing of said suit, the title to said homestead was in the father of said defendant, and he, the said father, refused to make a deed to the said defendant of said homestead unless he would procure a divorce from this plaintiff. That, relying upon said representations of said defendant, and to enable him to procure the said deed to said homestead, she neglected and failed to appear and defend said action for divorce. That, notwithstanding said representations, the said defendant falsely and knowingly testified in court that he had not forgiven this plaintiff for her adultery, and falsely and knowingly obtained a decree awarding the custody of the said children to him, and falsely and knowingly testified in court that he had not lived or cohabited with this plaintiff after having knowledge of said adultery, and forcibly, and against her consent, took from her her children, and turned them could vacate the judgment," seems to spring the rule which controls in a number of cases of attempts to vacate decrees collusively obtained.

This case and quotation are referred to in Greene v. Greene, 2 Gray, 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454, which was an action by a wife to have a decree of divorce obtained by the husband annulled on the ground of fraud and collusion, and the court says that by "collusion" it is not presumed that the petitioner meant to use it in its ordinary sense as collusion between the parties to the former proceeding, and so a fraud upon the law, because that would include herself as party to the fraud. The allegation was, therefore, understood as stating that the husband had colluded or combined with other persons to obtain false testimony, or otherwise aid him in fraudulently obtaining a decree.

In an attempt by the second husband of a woman divorced from her former husband by a collusive agreement, to have the decree vacated, the court states that such a fraud is not upon the individuals, but upon the law and court, and that no one has a strict right to the vacation of such a judgment; certainly not the parties thereto, who are in pari delicto, nor strangers to the record who are not affected thereby. Ruger v. Heckel, 21 Hun, 489.

Likewise, in Smith v. Smith, 48 Mo. App. 612, which was an appeal from a refusal to set aside a decree of divorce against a wife on her petition, the court, upon dismissing the appeal because the petition was not properly prosecuted, said that, were all other obstacles out of the way, it was exceedingly doubtful whether the wife, who claimed relief on the ground of her own collusion in bringing about the decree, would be entitled to relief on equitable grounds.

The point came up squarely in Hubbard v. Hubbard, 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170, where, more than a year after the granting of a divorce decree against a wife, procured fraudulently by her silence, in consideration of which she was to receive a certain amount of money, she, failing to realize the proceeds of her agreement, applied to set aside the decree. This application was denied, the court stating in regard to the contention that the decree should be set aside on the ground of public morals, that, should the relief asked for be granted, petitioner, profiting by her experience, might negotiate for another collusive divorce upon a cash in hand basis; also, that while courts should undoubtedly exercise care in dissolving the marriage relation, and decline to grant relief where collusion appears, nevertheless, that, after a decree has been rendered and acquiesced in for a long period of time, reasons which would in the first instance have caused it to be withheld may not be sufficient to warrant setting it aside.

Relief was denied upon various grounds in Brigham, Petitioner, 176 Mass. 223, 57 N. E. 328, where, after a husband's death his former divorced wife presented a petition to set aside a divorce for adultery obtained by him fifteen years before. The ground upon which she asked for relief was collusion, consisting in her agreement to accept a sum of money, a check for which was put in escrow until the granting of the decree, in consideration of which she made no defense, and thus allowed the husband to obtain a decree nisi, subsequent to which he repudiated the money arrangement, whereupon she filed a petition alleging her collusion and asking that the decree be set aside; but again entering into a collusive arrangement not to proceed with the petition upon the receipt of a certain sum, her petition was dismissed upon her nonappearance, and the decree nisi made absolute. In regard to the collusive arrangements, petitioner alleged that they were entered into through fear of her husband and her confidential adviser, who was her alleged correspondent, and who played upon her fears as to her support and as to publicity, and upon her petition to set aside the decree nisi there were added threats of an indictment for perjury if she should deny the charge of adultery admitted by her omission to defend upon the granting of the decree. From that time she took no steps until after the husband's death, upon the ground, as alleged, that his great wealth while he lived could have been used to shut off evidence to prove her case. This petition was not sustained by the court, and no relief granted for the reason that petitioner had had her day in court and a chance to try all the issues involved; and that as to the collusion, she could not obtain a locus standi from her own fraud upon the court, when she acted under a pressure produced by an appeal to her need for money, to her fear of an indictment for perjury if she testified to what she alleged to be the truth, or to her or her confidential adviser's fear of publicity, as well as by any fear of violence there may have been, when the proportion of the different elements was left indeterminate, and it was not improbable that her want of money may have been the chief motive for her consent. Also, the court stated that in such a proceeding as this the utmost diligence and good faith are indispensable conditions to its being heard, so that, whether the refusal to hear petitioner was based upon her laches or collusion, either was a sufficient reason.

Turpin v. Turpin (Tenn. Ch. App.) 58 S. W. 763, goes no farther than to hold that, the col-her out of her home, and left her without the means of support. That she is in indigent circumstances, and has no property or means with which to support herself or to pay the expenses of this action. That the defendant is a man of means, amply able to pay the expenses of this action, and to support this plaintiff."

The prayer of the complaint was that the decree of divorce be set aside; that the custody of the children be awarded to the plaintiff; and that alimony and certain sums of money for attorneys' fees and her support during the pendency of the action be awarded to her. The representations and false testimony of the defendant set out in the complaint, and the allegation in respect to the service of the summons in the divorce suit, were denied by the answer. In the third finding of fact, the trial court found lusion being a fraud participated in by both parties, the court of a state where neither party resides will leave them as it finds them. A wife herein collusively arranged and agreed with her husband whereby he went to Washington and filed a bill for divorce against her to which she answered under oath that she was a resident of that state, thereby inducing the proper court of that state to take jurisdiction of the proceedings. Upon these facts appearing upon a proceeding by the wife in Tennessee to vacate the decree, the court held that she could not be heard to complain in that state when neither of the parties resided there, nor did reside there at the time the decree complained of was rendered. Further, the court said that it did not believe any case could be found which, under the facts averred, would afford her any relief.

The express point decided in Kinnier v. Kinnier, 53 Barb. 454, Affirmed in 45 N. Y. 535, 6 Am. Rep. 132, is that the second husband of a woman who collusively obtained a divorce from her former husband could not be heard to question that decree. As a basis for that decision it is held that neither of the parties to a collusive decree can possibly avoid it.—it is binding upon both, and, therefore, the subsequent remarriage of the wife was valid, so that her second husband, being also a stranger to the divorce decree, had no interest therein which would authorize him to impeach the judgment for fraud.

This case was affirmed in 58 Barb. 424, and also upon appeal in 45 N. Y. 535, where the court said that it was alleged in the complaint that, after the pleadings were in, a decree was taken pro confesso, by collusion; that the rule in regard to impeaching a decree for fraud was that there must be facts which prove it to be against conscience to execute the judgment, and which the injured party could not make available in a court of law, or which he was prevented from presenting by fraud or accident unmixt with any fraud or negligence in himself or his agents; that, according to this rule, the decree was binding upon the parties to it, as neither could assert that it was not a valid judgment for the reason that both were equally guilty of the fraud; and, being binding upon the parties, the second husband of the divorced wife certainly could not have been defrauded or injured by it.

Whether the relief asked for is granted seems to depend largely upon the point of view from which the court considers the matter. If the fact of the parties being in pari delicto appeals to the mind of the court, the relief is, as the cases above show, withheld; while, if the fraud practised upon the law and court presents itself that the summons in the said divorce suit was duly served on the defendant in said action on the 30th day of July, 1900. Except in respect to the allegation relating to said summons, and the finding that the defendant herein, since the said decree of divorce, remarried on the 3d day of October, 1901, the other findings of fact are, in substance, the same as the aforesaid material allegations of the complaint. As conclusions of law from the findings of fact, the trial court found: "(1) That the plaintiff is not entitled to have the decree of divorce entered on the said 17th day of September, 1900, set aside, so far as it dissolves the bonds of matrimony between her and defendant. (2) That she is not entitled to recover attorneys' fees or suit money in this action. (3) That the plaintiff herein is entitled to have the said decree, so far as it more strongly, the proceedings are set aside without regard to the fault of the petitioner, as in the cases following:

In Mulkey v. Mulkey, 100 Cal. 91, 34 Pac. 621, a proceeding to vacate a judgment of divorce obtained by default, the court stated that the facts set forth in the affidavit of petitioner showed either collusion between the parties or that the defendant was grossly misled and deceived by her husband as to the grounds of divorce, and that in either case the court should have been prompt to set aside the judgment and allow defendant to answer, so that the case might be heard and determined on its merits; and the decree was vacated by an order which allowed defendant a reasonable time in which to answer.

One of the grounds upon a motion, in Hopkins v. Hopkins, 39 Wis. 167, to set aside a divorce decree, or to modify it as to certain provisions, was an alleged collusive agreement. The court, however, held the proof of it to be insufficient, and refused to vacate the judgment on that ground, but from the opinion it is apparent that, had such an agreement been proved, the decree would have been vacated, as it would have been considered a fraud upon the court and therefore not to be sanctioned.

Another decision, influenced by similar reasons, is Crocker v. Crocker, Sheldon, 257, where, upon a motion by a wife to set aside a divorce previously adjudged to the husband, it appeared that a collusive agreement had been entered into between the parties, the wife, for a consideration, agreeing to make no defense to the divorce proceedings. The decree was accordingly obtained by the husband, and he immediately remarried, whereupon the wife obtained a decree of divorce from the husband upon the ground of adultery on account of his remarriage, service of process in which proceeding was not, however, made upon him. Upon these facts appearing, the court stated that its almost irresistible impulse was to strike the first decree from the records, obtained, as it was, upon a collusive agreement, but that such act would declare the marriage of the husband with the woman he married subsequent to the granting of the decree adulterous, and thus the rights of a perhaps innocent third person would be infringed; therefore, the court merely opened the decree and allowed the wife to serve an answer, omitting, however, all charges of adultery against her husband, and only for the purposes of her own defense, on condition that she cancel the decree she had obtained, which the court said was a reproach to the administration of the law and an insult to the court.

Another test by which the right to relief is awards the custody of the children aforesaid to the said defendant, opened up and set aside, and is entitled to be allowed to answer in said divorce suit, setting up her rights, if any she has, to the said children, and for alimony and a division of the defendant's property. (4) That the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment, against the defendant, for her costs in this action." A decree in accordance therewith was made and entered. From this decree, both parties have taken an appeal.

The plaintiff contends that under the findings of fact she is entitled to a decree setting aside the decree of divorce, and the defendant contends that under the findings of fact the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief whatever. The findings of fact must support the judgment (8 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 643); and when it affirmatively appears that they fail to do so the judgment will be reversed on appeal. Maynard v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Ins. Assn. 14 Utah, 458, 47 Pac. 1030; Walley v. Deseret Nat. Bank, 14 Utah, 305, 47 Pac. 147.

From the findings, and the plaintiff's allegations that she, "relying upon the said representations of the defendant, and to enable him to procure a deed to said homestead, neglected and failed to appear and defend said action for divorce," it is clear that she freely consented to the institution of the divorce suit, and that the decree of divorce was obtained by the collusive agreement of the parties. The plaintiff, when she gave her consent, must have known that the contemplated divorce could only be procured by a suppression of the facts, and false testimony. It does not appear that she made any objections to the proceedings until after governed, which is somewhat apparent in this last decision, but more clearly appears in the cases following, is whether public policy requires it.

Thus, in Singer v. Singer, 41 Barb. 139, where the defendant in a divorce obtained on the charge of adultery sought to vacate the same on the ground of collusion consisting in an agreement that the defendant would make no defense except to serve her answer denying the charge, the court, in its opinion, states that, independently of any other considerations, if the motion was made in due season, the court would order any judgment of divorce obtained by collusion or fraud to be set aside, not from any regard to the parties concerned, but from motives of public policy; but, it appearing that the judgment had been acquiesced in for several years, and that the plaintiff therein had married again, the court thought that some better reason than the mere gratification of personal feeling or the desire to obtain a further sum of money should clearly appear before the court would be warranted in granting such an application, and also, the collusion not appearing sufficiently clear for the satisfaction of the court, the motion to vacate was denied.

In Firmin v. Firmin, 40 Phila. Leg. Int. 251, it appeared upon a rule obtained by a wife to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be vacated, that a decree of separation from her husband on the ground of adultery was granted her in England with alimony, after which he came to the United States, and, upon default being made in the payment of the alimony, she followed and found him living with another woman. An agreement was thereupon entered into whereby she agreed to consent to a divorce in consideration of a sum of money, in pursuance of which arrangement the money was paid and divorce decree granted in favor of her husband on the ground of desertion. Subsequently the husband married the other woman, by whom he had several children. The court held that, since the decree was not void, but only voidable, the question, was simply whether public policy demanded that the divorce should be vacated; and that, where the wife had had the benefit of her agreement for nine years, and the intervening rights of children had arisen, the public interests would be best subserved by leaving the parties as they were. The court stated, however, that there was no question that the decree would have been vacated had the application been made promptly, as it was clearly collusive, — a thing which public policy forbids.

In KARREN v. KARREN, while the considerations of public policy are recognized by the court, the decision is, however, based upon the 60 L. R. A principle that where parties are in pari delicto neither may complain of the fraud.

Prompt action is an element in favor of the petitioner, even though the divorce was collusively obtained, as in Danforth v. Danforth, 105 Ill. 603, upon a motion by a wife to vacate a divorce decree obtained against her, based upon an allegation of a collusive understanding between her attorney and her husband amounting to an agreement that no defense would be made by her, the court granted the relief asked, vacating the decree and letting in her defense, remarking that, it being the same term at which the decree was granted, it was still under the control of the court to amend, change, or vacate, as justice might require. It will be observed that in this case it does not appear that petitioner herself was a participant in the collusion, except by the act of her attorney.

The following cases, decided according to the peculiar circumstances of each, stand upon their own ground, not coming within any of the rules above observed:

In Harft v. Harft, 16 N. Y. Week. Dig. 461, a husband attempted to set a divorce decree aside which was obtained by virtue of a collusive agreement between him and plaintiff's attorney, but to which, however, plaintiff was not a party. The court refused the relief asked, not on the ground of the husband's collusion, but that, as plaintiff was entitled to the judgment, the fact that it was brought about by fraud and collusion between her attorney and defendant was no reason for setting it aside.

The defendant in a divorce proceeding had agreed, for a certain sum which she received, not to appear at the trial or contest plaintiff's suit for a divorce. At a subsequent term, after the decree was rendered, she made a motion to set it aside, which the court refused to grant, basing its decision not so much on the collusive agreement, however, as upon the statute (Rev. Stat. § 2185) providing that no petition for review of any judgment for divorce shall be allowed, and further holding that proceeding by motion for that purpose was within the prohibition of the statute. Nave v. Nave, 28 Mo. App. 505.

The facts show, in Friend v. Friend, 53 Mich. 543, 51 Am. Rep. 161, 19 N. W. 176, that, during the pendency of divorce proceedings, plaintiff's counsel and defendant, without plaintiff's knowledge, made an arrangement whereby a decree was entered with a small amount of alimony. Upon learning of the decree, plaintiff filed a bill to rescind it, which was granted. After employing new counsel, both parties proceeded with the proofs. In regard to the defendant, however, the court remarked that, if the defendant, more than one year after the divorce, had remarried. This suit was instituted thirteen months after the divorce. While a decree of divorce obtained by collusion of the parties, or by the suppression of the facts, or false testimony, is a fraud upon the court, and against public policy, it would be more against public policy to disturb the decree at the instance of either of the parties who are in pari delicto, when, after the divorce, as in this case, one of the parties has remarried. "After a decree of divorce is rendered other marriages may be contracted and children born, and it is against public policy to vacate the decree, as such order would render innocent parties guilty of bigamy, and their children illegitimate. Accordingly, the courts have sometimes refused to vacate decrees of divorce." 7 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 138. But when the vacation of a decree of divorce, obtained by collusion, is sought by a willing participant in the fraud, the court, on the principle of the maxim, Ex dolo malo non oritur actio, will refuse to disturb the decree, especially when the opposing party has remarried, and children have sprung from the second union. 2 Nelson, Div. & Sep. § 1055; 2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 1548; Hubbard v. Hubbard, 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170; Simons v. Simons, 47 Mich. 253, 645, 10 N. W. 360; Orth v. Orth, 69 Mich. 158, 37 N. W. 67; Yorston v. Yorston, 32 N. J. Eq. 495; Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60; Greene v. Greene, 2 Gray, 361, 61 Am. Dec. 454. In the latter case Shaw, Ch. J., said: "In using the term 'collusion' in the present case, we presume the libellant does not mean to use it in its ordinary sense, as collusion between the parties to the former proceeding [on di-divorce cases stood on the same footing with all other cases, it would feel bound to consider defendant estopped by the decree entered in the first instance by his procurement, so far as the main issue was concerned; but, as the law forbids all collusive divorces, and requires each case to stand on its proper equities, the facts would be examined.

Bishop in vol. 2, § 1548, of Marriages, Divorce, & Separation, in regard to this dictum says that he does not think Campbell, J., who wrote the opinion, meant it as a denial of the doctrine that collusion cannot be brought forward by either of the parties to it.

An attempt was made in Liem v. Liem, 5 Kulp, 178, by respondent in a divorce proceeding, to vacate a decree granted upon default, on the ground that she had a good defense, and that the decree was entered by fraud on the part of the libellant in that he paid her, through counsel, $100 on condition that she would not appear and make defense to the action. But the court refused to vacate the decree for the reason that respondent did not state what her defense was, and that there was no allegation of any collusion at the time the petition was filed, and the evidence was insufficient to establish the payment of the $100 subsequently.

V. Collateral attack.

a. By party obtaining.

The doctrine followed with practical uniformity is that a party who has obtained a divorce is precluded from disregarding it and attempting by further proceedings to gain the same or different relief, on the principle, mainly, that the first divorce must be held to dissolve the relation of husband and wife, and also on the ground that a person who has invoked the jurisdiction of a court may not disregard or attack the decision. There is some authority, however, for saying that, when a decree is utterly void, it may be attacked or disregarded even by the party obtaining it, in a collateral proceeding. An instance of this doctrine is Smith v. Smith, 13 Gray, 209, where a decree of divorce obtained by a husband without the state for a cause not sufficient within the state was held no defense to a subsequent action for divorce by him within the state, as it was wholly void therein. The court stated that, if this were a mere private action, there would be strong reason for considering the husband estopped by his former proceeding; but that a suit for a divorce is of a very different character, being one in which the public have an interest; and that, since the decree was wholly void in 60 L. R. A.

Massachusetts, there was no ground for saying that the relation of husband and wife no longer subsisted between the parties. And, without saying that the law of estoppel did not apply in matters of divorce, the court held that it would not apply where its operation would result in giving effect to a void decree.

If the decree is voidable, merely, the party obtaining it is bound by it,—at least until properly vacated. So, in Coddington v. Coddington, 10 Abb. Pr. 450, upon a motion for temporary alimony in an action by a wife for absolute divorce, it appearing that a decree for limited divorce had previously been obtained by her in another state, with the privilege to both parties of marrying again, subsequently conferred by act of legislature, the court held that, although there might be some doubt as to the validity of the decree in this state, nevertheless, until it should have been adjudged invalid, the plaintiff, by whom it was obtained, must in any event be held to be bound by it, and not be permitted to charge her former husband with the crime of adultery upon his remarriage subsequent to it.

A very similar case is Palmer v. Palmer, 1 Swabey & T. 551, 29 L. J. Mat. N. S. 26, 2 L. T. N. S. 89, 8 Week. Rep. 504, which, however, seems to go farther and hold that, even if the decree were void, it precluded the party obtaining it. In this case after a husband came to America and was joined by his wife, she obtained a divorce a vinculo from him in Philadelphia, and he subsequently remarried. Upon her return to England the wife presented a petition for dissolution of marriage upon the ground of adultery, cruelty, and bigamy, but it was held that the husband's remarriage could not be treated as cause for a petition for dissolution of marriage by petitioner in England; that, either the American decree was valid in England, in which case the parties were at full liberty to marry again, or the American decree could not be recognized in England as valid; but, having been obtained at petitioner's instance, she had no right to complain of the consequences which might naturally be expected to follow it.

Another instance of a voidable decree is Crabill v. Crabill, 22 Or. 588, 30 Pac. 320, where a party obtaining a divorce decree subsequently commenced another action for the same purpose before the same judge who rendered the former decree, utterly ignoring the same and attempting to treat it as a nullity and thereby secure in the subsequent suit support and alimony not granted in the former decree. The court held that the former suit operated as an estoppel against her in the later action; that, if she was dissatisfied with the former decree by reason of any mistake orce], and so a fraud upon the law, because that would include herself as party to the fraud. As said by Willes, Ch. J., in Prudam v. Phillips, reported in a note to Hargrave's Law Tracts, 456, "if both parties colluded in the cheat upon the court, it was never known that either of them could vacate the judgment." In the case of Hubbard v. Hubbard, 19 Colo. 13, 34 Pac. 170, the wife, who was the defendant in the divorce suit, after service on her of the summons, was induced to abstain from interposing any defense by the promise of her husband to pay to her, as soon as the decree of divorce was signed, $3,000, and to have certain lots in Denver deeded to her. Upon the failure of the husband to keep his promise, the wife filed a petition, in which she set out the promise of her husband, and alleged that they were made by the plaintiff for the purpose of inducing her to abstain from offering any evidence or making any defense to the action, and without any intention of performing the same. The petition was demurred to on the following grounds: "(1) That the petition does not state facts sufficient to entitle the defendant to maintain the same. (2) That it appears by the petition that the same is brought and presented by the defendant to set aside a decree of court obtained by consent, and in pursuance of a fraudulent and collusive purpose participated in by the defendant to deceive and defraud the court. (3) That it appears by the said petition that the same is presented for the purpose of enabling petitioner to take advantage of a certain corrupt, collusive, and illegal agreement therein set up." In the opinion of the court, sustaining the demurrer, Hayt, Ch. J., said:

or inadvertence, she could have remedied it or vacated it upon a proper showing; or, if there was any fraud or collusion practised upon her when the decree was procured, she might have resorted to equity to set it aside; but, it appearing that the court had jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, and there being no pretense in the pleadings of any fraud or mistake, the former decree was valid and binding on the parties.

A new ground of decision is presented in Lacey v. Lacey, 38 Misc. 196, 77 N. Y. Supp. 235, which was an action for a divorce on the ground of adultery. The defense was that the alleged adultery was not meretricious in that the plaintiff had theretofore procured a decree of divorce against the defendant in another state, in pursuance of which defendant had legally married the alleged correspondent. The plaintiff claimed that this decree was void and of no effect. The court based its decision sustaining the defense partly on the ground that, the courts of the state granting the decree appearing to have jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, and this procedure appearing to have been regular and valid according to the law of that state, therefore, under art. 4, § 1, of the Constitution of the United States, to the effect that full faith and credit must be given in each state to the judicial proceedings of every other state, such decree was binding—certainly so far as plaintiff was concerned—in the courts of New York. As a further ground, it was held that, having invoked the jurisdiction of the court, plaintiff, in all equity and good conscience, should not be permitted to attack the authority of the decree which her own acts induced the court to grant her.

The collateral attack is often made in an attempt by the party obtaining the divorce to subsequently obtain an interest in the other's estate, thus involving a repudiation of the decree.

Such an attempt was made in Milimore v. Milmore, 40 Pa. 151, where, after acquiescing in and acting upon a divorce decree granted in her favor for more than seven years and until after her husband's death, the complainant therein alleged its invalidity on the ground that she caused the subpoena to be issued in vacation and but twelve days before the ensuing term, whereas an act of assembly required the interval to be at least thirty days and demanded dower in her husband's estate. The court held her estopped to question the validity of the decree, not only by her long acquiescence, but also for the reason that, the court granting the decree having jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject-matter, it was not void, but only voidable, if attacked in time by a party who had the right to object, in a direct, and not a collateral, proceeding.

So, it was held in Re Morrisson, 52 Hun. 102, 5 N. Y. Supp. 90, that the legal representatives of a deceased husband may not question the validity of a divorce decree obtained by him; that were he living, having invoked the jurisdiction of the court and submitted himself thereto, he could not afterwards be heard to question such jurisdiction, and that his legal representatives occupy precisely the same position, not under the doctrine of estoppel, but upon the principle that, where a party has gone into a court and invoked its jurisdiction, he cannot subsequently attack the decree of the court obtained at his instance, because of the want of jurisdiction of somebody else.

Another decision based upon the same reasoning is Re Swales, 60 App. Div. 599, 70 N. Y. Supp. 220. The facts were that, after a woman had obtained an absolute divorce from her husband, without any appearance on his part, she subsequently married another man, with whom she lived for eighteen years and by whom she had a child; upon her first husband's decease she asked to be allowed to administer his estate, claiming to be his widow. The court held that this would not be allowed; that such a decree, while void against the nonappearing defendant, was valid so far as it affected the marital status of the plaintiff; and that, while it probably would not be technically correct to assert that plaintiff's acts constituted an estoppel, for the reason that they were not designed to and did not influence decedent to do anything which he would not otherwise have done, yet, that the case justified the application of a similar principle, viz., that where a party has invoked the jurisdiction of any court, and submitted himself thereto, he cannot afterwards be heard to question such jurisdiction.

Asbury v. Powers, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1622, 65 S. W. 603, goes upon the same theory. This was an action to determine which of two claimants was the widow of a decedent, for the purpose of administering his estate. It appeared that, twenty-five years before, the one who was his wife at that time commenced an action for maintenance in a court which had no jurisdiction of the parties, but, for the purpose of obtaining a hearing, she made an averment alleging the jurisdiction of the court; subsequently, an amended petition was filed asking for an enlarged decree, and, upon her appearing in court of her own volition, and, so far as the record showed, the court appearing to have jurisdiction, a decree was rendered in her favor. Upon these facts appearing, it was held that this claimant, having invoked the jurisdiction of the court,

"It is apparent upon the face of the petition that plaintiff in error was in no way misled or deceived as to the nature of the original action. She was duly served with process of summons and a copy of the complaint, and had at her service able counsel to defend her interests. Thus advised and prepared, she entered into a secret, collusive agreement with defendant in error, and for a promised consideration aided him by her silence to impose upon the court and procure a divorce. After the entry of the decree thus obtained, she remained silent for more than one year, and only upon failure to realize the consideration promised for her shameless bargain did she apply for relief." In 2 Bishop, Marr. & Div. § 1548, the doctrine is clearly stated as follows: "Mutual fraud, of which the common instance is collusion and which is available to third persons in interest, as we shall see in the next subtitle, cannot be brought forward by either of the parties against the other as ground for reversing any step in the cause, or vacating the sentence. This doctrine is an inevitable result from the universal rule of our law that one in a court of justice cannot complain of his own wrong, or of another's wrong whereof he was a partaker. It would be a special novelty for a plaintiff to address the tribunal with, 'The defendant and I have been playing a trick on this court, but I discover that he has got the better of me, so please turn the tables on him.'" Also, in Broom, Legal Maxims, 711, thus: "No court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act." In the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miner, in the case of Short v. Bullion-Beck & C. Min. Co. 20 Utah, could not, after so great a lapse of time, impeach, in a collateral proceeding, a decree of divorce fixing the status of the parties.

In Juller v. Juller, 62 Ohio St. 90, 56 N. E. 661, a proceeding by a wife for assignment of dower in her husband's estate, ten years after she had obtained a decree of divorce from him which included a provision releasing all her dower rights in consideration of a certain sum agreed to be paid as alimony, she based her right to relief upon the allegation that such release of dower rights was inserted in the decree without her knowledge or consent, admitting, however, that her attorney, who was authorized to represent her in the bringing and the conduct of the suit,—had full knowledge of its contents as entered. The court states that, there being no fraud or collusion charged, and the decree being a public record with the provisions of which petitioner was, after the rendition, charged with constructive notice, she could not, ten years after it was granted, be released from its obligation upon the plea that she was ignorant of its provisions as entered of record, or that her attorney was without authority to have it so entered.

Likewise, in Ellis v. White, 61 Iowa, 644, 17 N. W. 28, in an action to partition certain lands by one claiming as the widow of decedent, the court held that her claim was not substantiated by facts showing to the satisfaction of the court that nearly thirty years before she had authorized an attorney to procure a decree of divorce, which had been done, and that alimony granted therein had been paid her, for which she had given a receipt. To plaintiff's contention that the court granting the decree did not have jurisdiction under the statute then in force, the court held that, without deciding whether the court had jurisdiction or not, the plaintiff could not now take advantage of the defect; that, having authorized her attorney to prosecute the case, and having received the money allowed her by the decree, she was estopped to insist now on want of jurisdiction of the court.

McKelvey v. McKelvey, 112 Mich. 274, 70 N. W. 582, was said by the court to be within the rule of Owen v. Yale, 75 Mich. 256, 42 N. W. 817, infra, V. b. A wife agreed to accept a deed of land and a certain amount of money in lieu of all interest in her husband's estate upon the granting of a divorce against him. The agreement took the form of a stipulation, and, although dower was not specifically mentioned, it provided that such payment and conveyance should be in full of all expenses and alimony against the husband. Afterwards she brought ejectment to recover dower in his lands, the 60 L. R. A.

prosecution of which was restrained by the court, citing Owen v. Yale, as above stated.

In an action by a wife to recover past-due instalments of money adjudged to her in a divorce decree obtained by the husband in North Dakota, the evidence showing that the decree was collusively obtained, it was held that the vicious agreement which led up to the divorce was not available to the husband in a collateral attack upon the decree; that the provision complained of was inserted in accordance with the collusive agreement consented to by the husband, and, the collusion being a fraud upon the court in which both parties were equally guilty, neither could afterwards allege the fraud to secure a further benefit. France v. France, 79 N. Y. Supp. 579.

A few decisions in New York have not been in line with the almost uniform doctrine above shown, being decided more in line with Smith v. Smith, 13 Gray, 209, supra, on the theory that the decree was void, and therefore might be attacked collaterally, even by the party obtaining it, without regard to the principle that the party obtaining a decree is afterwards estopped from questioning it.

The earliest case of this nature is Todd v. Kerr (1864) 42 Barb. 317, where a wife being a resident of New Jersey, obtained a legislative divorce against her husband, a resident of New York, without his agency, consent, or knowledge. The court held that she was not estopped to allege its invalidity in an action for dower against the heir at law of her deceased husband for the reason that its procurement did not influence her husband to do acts which he would not otherwise have done; and also, it being a void decree for want of jurisdiction, the husband was not bound by it, and therefore could not claim the advantage of it, and his heir at law, standing in his place, had no more rights.

Holmes v. Holmes, 57 Barb. 305, was a decision according to the rule of estoppel. Here, in an action for divorce a vinculo, defendant pleaded a prior divorce obtained in another state for cruel and inhuman treatment. Plaintiff demurred to this defense. The court overruled the demurrer, holding that the jurisdiction acquired by personal service of process upon defendant while out of the state was sufficient, being in accordance with the laws of that state, at least to preclude plaintiff from questioning it; that it would seem preposterous that he should attempt to invalidate a decree to which he was a party, which he procured to be made, and upon the faith of which defendant acted; and that, while every decree is liable to be impeached for fraud, collusion, or want of jurisdiction, those are considerations which cannot arise upon a demurrer.

20, 30, 45 L. R. A. 603, 606, 57 Pac. 720, 722, it was said: "If the plaintiff requires any aid from the illegal transaction in order to enable him to sue his claim, he cannot enforce it. Where a contract grows immediately out of, and is connected with, an illegal or immoral act, it will not be enforced. The test to determine whether the action arises ex stirpe causa is the plaintiff's ability to establish his case without any aid from the illegal transaction. If his cause or right to recover depends upon a transaction which is malum in se, or prohibited by law, and which he must prove, in order to make out his case, he cannot recover." Since the remarriage of the defendant his second wife has not borne any children, but it is conceded by counsel that she is enceinte.

Upon appeal from this decision, however, in Holmes v. Holmes, 4 Lans. 388, the court cited Todd v. Kerr (1864) 42 Barb. 317, supra, and held that plaintiff was not estopped from denying the validity of the divorce obtained by him, as it was invalid and inoperative in New York; that courts will not allow either party to deny the existence of a marriage; that they have no power of themselves, either in form or effect, to dissolve their marriage contract, as would be done if effect should be given to the estoppel claimed on behalf of defendant.

Although Smith v. Smith, 13 Gray, 209, supra, is not referred to, from the fact of its being a prior decision, and from the similarity in the reasoning the inference is almost irresistible that it influenced the decision herein.

Upon the hearing of Starbuck v. Starbuck, 62 App. Div. 437, 71 N. Y. Supp. 104, in a long and exhaustive opinion the court came to the conclusion that a valid decree terminating the marriage relationship as against a citizen of this state required a voluntary appearance or such service of process as would be valid in actions in personam, and that, whatever effect was to be given the decree there in question, which was a decree granted in Massachusetts on the ground of extreme cruelty, since the service was insufficient and defendant did not appear, must be confined to the plaintiff and to the state in which it was granted; and that in this state it was without binding force or efficacy in any respect, for any purpose, and as to either party. In regard to the contention urged that plaintiff was attempting to assail the jurisdiction which she had invoked, the court stated that she did not attack the validity of the decree which she had obtained, but, when it was offered to defeat her claim, she merely asserted the limits of its validity. To this decision there was a dissenting opinion upholding the doctrine that the plaintiff, having invoked the jurisdiction of the Massachusetts court, could not afterwards in good conscience refuse to abide by its decree dissolving her marital bonds, and could not assert its invalidity for the purpose of claiming dower in the property of her divorced husband, acquired after the decree and his remarriage.

Upon the appeal to the court of appeals the decision (173 N. Y. 503, 66 N. E. 193), seems to have been rendered with a clearer insight into the principles really involved, and without being hampered by considerations which seemed momentous in the lower court, but which, viewing the case from its relation to all others of its class, were not involved in its decision. It was held that the decree which granted a divorce against the husband without the state on the ground of extreme cruelty, upon personal service without his appearance in the action or submission to the jurisdiction of the court, should have been admitted in evidence in behalf of the administratrix of the husband's estate in the action by the first wife to recover dower as his widow, as the defendants had a right to avail themselves of a decree obtained by their opponent, although she could not avail herself of a void decree which she had procured to be entered, under the well-established principle that where a party, by submitting himself to the jurisdiction of the court, has procured a judgment or decree to be entered, he cannot thereafter be heard to question it. Further, the opinion stated that there were a number of cases in which the courts of this state have refused to recognize the validity of divorces obtained in other states, upon grounds insufficient for that purpose in this state, when defendant resided here and was not personally served with process and did not appear in the action; but that, in none of these cases did the party procuring the decree seek a benefit by having it held invalid; that a party cannot avail himself of a defense or of a right to recover by means of an invalid decree or judgment which he himself has procured to be entered in his own favor.

Section 1212, Rev. Stat., provides that subsequent changes may be made in a decree of divorce, by the court, in respect to the disposal of the children or the distribution of property. Such changes must be applied for, and can only be granted, in the action in which the decree of divorce was granted. We think it is clear, both from the allegations of the complaint and the findings of fact, that the plaintiff is not entitled to any relief in this action.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed, with costs, and the action dismissed.

The court states, in Elliott v. Wohlfrom, 55 Cal. 384, that it knows of no principle upon which the plaintiff in an action of divorce can be permitted to impeach the judgment rendered in it, for the purpose of recovering property from the defendant in that action which he could obtain on no other ground than that he had obtained the judgment through fraud. This was an action by the grantee of plaintiff in a prior divorce action to recover in ejectment against the grantee of the defendant in the divorce proceedings, and the case turned on the validity of the divorce decree. The court, in harmony with the above statement, held that, if the plaintiff in the divorce suit were the plaintiff in this action, and the defendant in that action were the defendant in this, the court would not permit the plaintiff to attack that judgment on the ground that he obtained it by fraud of which the defendant was not only innocent but ignorant, and that the grantees of these respective parties occupy in this respect no better or worse positions than their several grantors would, if this action were between them.

An unusual case, and one which, while not exactly a variance of the rule, because the circumstances are so dissimilar to others where the question arises, nevertheless is decided on the theory that the divorce attacked was void, and that the attack was therefore allowable, although made by the party obtaining it, is People v. Chase, 27 Hun, 256. The defendant herein, in a prosecution against him for bigamy, defended on the ground that the two marriages alleged to have been contracted by him were absolutely void, as he had been previously married, and a divorce obtained by him from his first wife for desertion was void, inasmuch, as far as appeared from the evidence, she was not at the time a resident of the state wherein the decree was obtained, and process was not served upon her or actual notice of the proceedings given her. Under these circumstances the court, with regret, arrived at the conclusion that a conviction for bigamy could not be sustained, and judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered.

b. By party who has consented to, or colluded in, its procurement.

A woman who, while an infant, consented to a divorce decree containing a provision for alimony in lieu of dower, and acquiesced therein upon becoming of age, by receiving and enjoying all the privileges conferred upon her by the decree, was held, in Bourne v. Simpson, 9 B. Mon. 454, to have no right to dower in property sold after her husband's death, to pay his debts, under her claim that she was an infant when she consented to such decree.

After the granting of a consent decree of divorce upon stipulation of the parties, for desertion, with leave to both parties to remarry, and granting $20,000 alimony to the wife, acted upon by the wife by her subsequent remarriage, she attempted to obtain dower in her former husband's estate; but, in a bill to quiet title against the claim of dower by the grantee of lands formerly owned by the husband, who was then deceased, the court held, in Owen v. Yale, 75 Mich. 256, 42 N. W. 817, that, although there was some doubt as to whether a divorce could have been granted on the grounds alleged, nevertheless, a consent decree cannot be appealed from, and it was not absolutely void whether erroneous or not; also, that the provision made was agreed to be in lieu of dower, and was a mutual agreement, which was, by consent, made a matter of record, and estopped both parties to it. Further, the court thought that it was not improper to show the wife's previous assent and understanding of the decree for the purpose of showing that it was not entered without her knowledge and approval.

There was, perhaps, no actual, specific, consent in Kirrrigan v. Kirrrigan, 15 N. J. Eq. 146, but both parties were before the court in a divorce proceeding instituted by the husband, and the wife appeared by counsel and received a sum of money decreed her as alimony. In subsequent divorce proceedings instituted by her, it was held that the above fact appearing, the wife would not be permitted to impugn the decree previously granted on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, and her motion for alimony and counsel fees pendente lite was denied.

Very similar to the last case, as far as the nature of the consent is concerned, is Mohler v. Shank, 93 Iowa, 273, 34 L. R. A. 161, 61 N. W. 981. Some time after a husband was adjudged insane his guardian obtained a decree of divorce against the wife, upon the entry of which a certain amount was paid, agreed by her to be in full of any claim she might have against her husband's estate. After remarriage, and upon her former husband's death, she claimed a distributive share in his estate upon the ground that the divorce decree was void for want of jurisdiction, and that she was the widow of decedent. This claim the court refused to allow, holding that, although the decree was void, the petitioner was estopped from attacking it, either directly or indirectly, by her knowledge of the proceedings at the time they were pending, shown by her appearance in the action; and, after the decree was entered, by her acceptance of the alimony according to a previous agreement, and by her subsequent marriage during the lifetime of her first husband; that there could not have been a more complete acceptance of the benefits of the decree.

But in Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328, the court held that no question of estoppel can arise between the parties to a void decree; that a party must be in a condition to assert a right before he can maintain it by estoppel. This decision was rendered upon the contention that a husband, by a written consent to a divorce and by receiving money therefor, was estopped from denying either such consent or the validity of the divorce in a collateral proceeding to secure an interest in his wife's estate, although the decree was wholly void for want of jurisdiction; and that, while the proceedings relating to the divorce might be incompetent to affect his status as husband of his deceased wife, they were competent to affect an incident of that relation, and to estop him from claiming any of the rights of a husband.

Upon a wife's filing a bill for a decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, the husband, without hope of a reconciliation, and desiring only to save his property, agreed, through his solicitor, that, although her evidence was not sufficient, nevertheless, he would withdraw from opposition, and complainant might take her decree if she would take it without costs as against him, and without alimony. Upon an attempt by the wife, after the rendition of the decree as agreed, to recover dower, allowed by statute against the estate of a husband after a divorce by the wife for extreme cruelty the same as though he were dead, the husband demurred and asked that the decree be declared void for fraud in that he was not informed as to the existence of the dower rights, and supposed that all claims against his property were extinguished by the agreement stated; but it was held that the solemn adjudication of the court upon the rights of the parties must stand unless impeached for fraud perpetrated by the party obtaining it upon the other party, and that it did not sufficiently appear that the husband was misled or defrauded in what was done, but the court thought, on the contrary, that he understood the same fully, and agreed and consented thereto. Orth v. Orth, 69 Mich. 158, 37 N. W. 67.

In De Graw v. De Graw, 7 Mo. App. 121, numerous elements seem to have contributed to the decision, including consent, collusion, fraud, and laches or acquiescence. The action was brought by the wife for a divorce. The husband set up a former divorce obtained by him and alleged to have been acquiesced in by the wife at the time of its rendition. The wife replied that her consent and withdrawal of opposition were the result of intimidation and threats, and that the decree was collusively obtained, and therefore void. The husband had remarried and had children by the second marriage. It was held that, the former divorce being not void but voidable only, the relief would not be granted on account of the fraud or collusion, where the divorce had been acquiesced in for years, its benefits enjoyed, and an innocent party involved.

The theory on which the courts have almost universally acted in cases of attempt by one of the parties to a divorce decree to impeach it collaterally on the ground of collusion was first advanced in Prudam v. Phillips (1737). The report of this case is taken from manuscript notes of Mr. Ford, an eminent barrister, given by Mr. Hargrave in his Law Tracts, p. 456, also cited in a note to the Duchess of Kingston's Case, 20 How. St. Tr. 479. This was an action of assumpsit brought against defendant, who put in evidence a marriage with one M. Plaintiff showed a sentence annulling that marriage, whereupon it was agreed that, unless defendant could be admitted to show great fraud in obtaining the decree, it was conclusive. But the court asked who ever knew that a defendant could plead that a judgment obtained against him was fraudulent; that he must apply to the court, "and, if both parties colluded in the cheat upon the court, it was never known that either of them could vacate the judgment." And the court came to the conclusion that, whether defendant was imposed upon, or whether she joined in deceiving the court, she could not plead the matter, but must apply to the proper judge.

With the exception of the above case, which is the only English authority cited on this question, there is a dearth of English decisions which may, perhaps, be explained by the fact that until act of Parliament August 28, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. chap. 85), absolute divorces were not common in England, being granted only by act of Parliament, thereby involving great expense, and were, therefore, exclusively a privilege of the aristocracy and the wealthy; also, during this time, in order to guard against collusion, it appears that, according to a standing order and the usage of the House of Lords, questions were put to a petitioner for divorce as to whether there had been any collusion, directly or indirectly, relative to the adultery charged, or in regard to the divorce endeavored to be obtained. In Scotland, for a similar purpose, the pursuer is in all cases required to take what is termed the "oath of calumny," declaring, among other statements, that there is no collusion between the parties or any other persons to obtain the decree; and, in regard to collusion, Fergusson, as reported in 3 Eng. Eccl. Rep. 482, says that the records of the consistorial court of Scotland do not, perhaps, exhibit a single attempt to detect this malpractice which has been successful in the result. And, too, it is stated as a rule in Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55, 37 L. J. Ch. N. S. 433, 18 L. T. N. S. 833, that, according to the law of Scotland, reduction of a decree of divorce upon the ground of collusion cannot be pronounced after a year and a day from its date,—this rule, however, refers, so far as appears, to a vacation of the decree at the instance of the court, not upon application of one of the parties; but it tends to show the inviolability of divorce decrees after they are once settled.

With the passage of the act above referred to, and its amendments, which transferred the jurisdiction over matrimonial causes to the probate and divorce division, the precautions against collusion were not relaxed, for it is provided that decrees nisi shall first be rendered, and in the interim of six months before the decree absolute is granted the searching eye of the Queen's proctor aims to discover any fraud or collusion which may exist, and upon very slight suspicion may intervene and investigate the proceedings; so that upon the rendering of the decree absolute there is small chance that it will ever be disturbed.

The phrase quoted from Prudam v. Phillips, that, "if both parties colluded in the cheat upon the court, it was never known that either of them could vacate the judgment," may be said to control the American decisions; although the opinions are not always couched in those terms; nevertheless, that is the result almost uniformly arrived at.

One of the grounds by which complainant attempted to invalidate a divorce decree in Milimore v. Milimore, 40 Pa. 151, was that it was obtained by collusion; but the court held that it would be a monstrous doctrine to permit parties to tamper with judicial proceedings in such a manner, "to initiate them, carry them through, act upon them as valid, and afterwards allege that they were hired, coaxed, or maltreated into becoming parties to the fraud, and seek to invalidate them in a collateral proceeding by a plea of fraud;" adding "that is what cannot be done."

So, in Davis v. Davis, 61 Me. 395, in an action by a wife for dower to which she was entitled upon a divorce obtained by her against her husband, he attempted to impeach the divorce decree on the ground of collusion; but the court held that the parties to an action cannot impeach the judgment rendered therein in any collateral proceeding upon the ground that it was obtained by their fraud or collusion; that it was their business to see that it was not so obtained.

Four years after the granting of a divorce decree, collusively obtained against the wife with her knowledge and consent, and two years after the remarriage of the husband, the wife filed a bill against him in Nichols v. Nichols, 25 N. J. Eq. 60, for a divorce a vinculo on the ground of adultery, and for alimony and the custody of her children. Upon the appearance of the husband with the plea of the former decree, complainant replied that it was fraudulently obtained, and that the court was without jurisdiction to grant it; but it was held that the parties to a collusive divorce are bound by it,—at least, in the absence of some better reason than the mere gratification of personal feeling or the desire to obtain a further sum of money; also, that the only reason for intervention by the court would be in the interests of public policy, and, after the acquiescence of both parties in the decree for a space of four years, and the remarriage of one of them, it would not be allowed on that ground.

And in Moor v. Moor (Tex. Civ. App.) 63 S. W. 347, a divorced husband attempted to defend an action by his wife to partition community property upon the ground that he and petitioner were husband and wife, never having been legally divorced. But, it appearing that the husband employed counsel to institute in the name of his wife a suit against him for the divorce, and that, if the decree was fraudulently obtained, he participated in the fraud, and was in active collusion with the wife for the purpose of obtaining the divorce, it was held that, although they were not residents of the state at the time the decree was granted, nevertheless, having voluntarily appeared and submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, the validity of the decree could not be collaterally attacked by either of the parties on the ground that neither of them was subject to the jurisdiction of the court, although the divorce might not be effectual to protect them against the state; that the party who invokes the aid of a court cannot be heard to question the jurisdiction.

It was held in Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 77, 35 N. E. 761, that a husband could not set up, as a defense to an action in another state, that a decree of divorce obtained from his wife had been obtained by collusion with her; nor could he urge such alleged collusion in the court of the state where the decree was granted as a reason for setting the same aside, under the well-settled principle that in a court of justice a man cannot complain of a wrong done by himself, or of another's wrong in which he was a partaker; and that, as such a defense was for-bidden to him, it was as much forbidden to his administrator, after the husband's death.

To a similar effect is Re Ellis, 55 Minn. 401, 23 L. R. A. 287, 56 N. W. 1056, holding that where, in an action for a divorce in a court of another state, both parties voluntarily appear and submit to the jurisdiction, they are barred by the judgment, and the wife may not avoid the decree in a collateral proceeding for the purpose of being appointed administrator of her former husband's estate, by proof that, when the action was brought and judgment rendered, neither of them was a resident of the other state, but both were residents of Minnesota. The court states that, if the parties do consent to such void jurisdiction, why should they be heard to complain of the consequences to them of what they have done, and be permitted to escape those consequences by saying: "It is true that, by false oath made by one of us and connived at by the other, we committed a fraud in the Wisconsin court, and induced it to take cognizance of the case, but now we ask to avoid its judgment by proof of our fraud and perjury or subornation of perjury." And therefore, as far as their individual interests were concerned, the court thought that the parties must abide by the judgment they procured the court to render, and that what would bind them would, of course, bind those claiming through them or either of them. But the court said, in the course of the opinion, that, so far as the state of residence is concerned, it cannot be bound by its resident citizens appearing in and consenting to the jurisdiction of a court in another state in an action for divorce.

Nelson on Divorce & Separation, vol. 2, § 1056, calls the doctrine of this case novel and erroneous, and says: "So far as this opinion asserts the validity of this collusive decree, it is clearly wrong, because the fundamental principle of jurisdiction is overlooked. Jurisdiction over the subject-matter cannot be conferred by consent of the parties. The same result could have been reached by holding the decree void for lack of jurisdiction, and that the wife was estopped from attacking the decree by her fraud and collusion, by accepting the alimony awarded by it, and by permitting the decree to remain in force until the husband had married again."

In Neely v. Neely, 9 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 201, an action to set aside an entry of satisfaction appended to a divorce decree granted a husband, awarding alimony to the wife (plaintiff herein), and to enforce a decree for a balance claimed to be unpaid, the facts showed the fulfillment of an agreement entered into by the parties whereby the wife agreed to receive a certain sum in satisfaction of alimony irrespective of the amount to be ordered by the court, in consideration that no proof be offered against her to support the charge of adultery. Upon these facts appearing, the court held that, upon payment of the agreed amount at the time the decree was granted, the agreement was fully executed, and the wife could not afterward be heard to complain of the fraudulent contract, to which she was a party, to suppress testimony at the trial of the divorce action.

But in Daniels v. Benedict, 50 Fed. 347, a suit in equity by a wife against trustees of her deceased husband's will for a partition of his estate, she was allowed to treat an absolute divorce fraudulently rendered against her as a nullity, for the reason that she was prevented by fraud from presenting her case fully to the court, and the fraud, thus pertaining to matter extrinsic to the subject-matter of the divorce action, might be collaterally attacked. The wife was prevented from a full presentation of her case by agreement entered into between the parties whereby she agreed that a decree might be rendered against her on the ground of desertion in consideration of a certain sum; but, it appearing that the agreement was urged upon her at a time when she was ill, penniless, and abandoned, and that the decree rendered was absolute on the ground of adultery, the court held that the parties were not in pari delicto, and that, in the furtherance of justice and a sound public policy, the wife, being comparatively the more innocent, would be aided. In regard to the contention that the statute of limitations barred any relief, the court stated that, this being an action to recover property which, if she had any rights at all therein, was held in trust for her, the statute had no application to such a relation; also, it appeared that as soon as she discovered the fraud she had brought suit to annul the decree, which suit was pending at the time her husband died, after which she brought this action.

The following significant statement is made by Chief Justice Cooley in People v. Dawell, 25 Mich. 247, 12 Am. Rep. 260: "But it is said that, if the parties appear in the case, the question of jurisdiction is precluded. That might be so if the matter of divorce was one of private concern exclusively." The point decided was, however, not the right of one of the parties to question the decree, but that the state of residence is not precluded from attacking a decree of divorce obtained in another jurisdiction by consent of the parties.

VI. Summary.

As a general rule, the party obtaining a divorce decree will not be relieved therefrom upon his application to set it aside, upon the broad principle that, having induced the court to render the judgment, he is estopped from afterwards attacking it, except, of course, for fraud upon himself, mistake, or surprise. The only decision found to the contrary, which is directly in point, is Ficener v. Ficener, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 867, 8 S. W. 597, supra, II. a.

Where the decree is obtained in the wife's name, but through the efforts of the husband, without her knowledge or consent, she may, of course, have it set aside as a fraud both upon her and upon the court.

There is but one instance (supra, III.) of the application of both parties to set aside the divorce proceedings; that attempt, however, was successful, the court conditioning only that the property rights which third persons might have acquired under the decree must be protected.

One consenting to a judgment of divorce places himself under the same rules that control the party obtaining it.

Closely connected with consent decrees, and often hard to be distinguished from them, are decrees collusively obtained. While the result, upon an attempt to vacate them, is the same according to the weight of authority, nevertheless, the principle by which that result is arrived at is somewhat different when the court decides that the transactions entered into partake of the nature of collusion rather than consent. Consent decrees are not considered reprehensible when there are valid grounds for the divorce, but collusion is a fraud upon the court and upon the law; so that the doctrine stated in the old English case of Prudam v. Phillips, supra, V. b. that, "if both parties colluded in the cheat upon the court it was never known that either of them could vacate the judgment," has come to be a rule of law. Sometimes, however, the fraud that has been practised upon the law presents itself so strongly to the mind of the court as to outweigh the guilt of the petitioner; so that a few decisions uphold setting aside a collusive divorce even upon application of one of the parties, on the ground of public policy.

In collateral attacks by the parties obtaining decrees, the same rule controls as upon direct applications, only the cases present a distinction between void and voidable decrees; so that there is some authority for saying that, when a decree is utterly void for want of jurisdiction, it may be attacked or disregarded collaterally, even by the party obtaining it. While these cases seem reasonable, nevertheless, when the specific question arises as to the right of a party obtaining a decree to subsequently question it, the decisions holding him estopped by having invoked the jurisdiction of the court which rendered the judgment, without going into any inquiry as to the validity of the decree, seem nearer right in principle, and do, in fact, voice the rule as laid down by the majority of the cases.

In regard to collateral attacks by the party consenting, the rule is the same as upon direct attacks, with the exception of one case, Hardy v. Smith, 136 Mass. 328, supra, V. b, holding that no estoppel can arise between the parties to a void decree.

The rule of Prudam v. Phillips, above referred to, controls almost without exception in collateral attacks upon collusive decrees, the only decision allowing the applicant any relief being Daniels v. Benedict, 50 Fed. 347, supra, V. b; and in that case the court held that the parties were not in pari delicto, the wife having been coerced into entering into the collusive agreement when she was ill, penniless, and abandoned. v.

James H. POE.

(.....Ind.....)

1. An act the title to which relates to the issuance of checks by merchants in payment of wages assigned to them cannot be expanded to include persons and corporations generally by the use of the words "or any other person" after the word "merchants" in the body of the act, where the Constitution makes void so much of the act as is not expressed in the title.
2. An act requiring the redemption in money of checks issued in payment of assigned wages, which is applicable only to merchants on the one hand and coal miners on the other, is void as class legislation.

Mr. James B. Filbert, for appellee:

The act of the legislature is an act within the powers vested in the legislature, and is constitutional.

Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L. R. A. 576, 23 N. E. 253.

Dewling, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the appellee against the appellant under the act of act of March 11, 1901 (Acts 1901, p. 548; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1901, § 7448a), to recover from the appellant the amount of wages assigned by one Walsh, an employee in a coal mine in this state, to the appellant, in consideration of the issue to him of four metallic tokens calling for and payable in goods at the store of the appellant in this state. The complaint stated facts sufficient to bring the case within the statute, and a demurrer to it was overruled. An answer was filed by appellant, alleging that the wages assigned were already earned at the time of such assignment; that appellant had for years owned and carried on a general retail store in this state; that the four metallic tokens expressed the agreement of the appellant to pay in merchandise, at his store, at the usual cash price, the amount stamped on each of them; that Walsh, the miner, knew this, and agreed to accept merchandise in payment of the sum represented by said tokens; that the appellee had notice of these facts when he became the owner of the said tokens; that appellant has at all times been ready and willing to pay said tokens in merchandise, according to his agreement, but that neither Walsh nor the appellee has at any time demanded payment of said tokens in merchandise. A demurrer to the answer having been sustained, the appellant refused to plead further, and, upon proof of his complaint, judgment was rendered in favor of the appellee. The errors assigned are: (1) That the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and (2) in sustaining the demurrer to the answer.

The question presented is the validity of the act of March 11, 1901, prohibiting the issuing of tokens, payable otherwise than in lawful money of the United States, upon an assignment of wages, earned or unearned, by any employee or laborer in any coal mine in this state, and making any such tokens issued in violation of the act, in the hands of any owner, immediately due and payable in lawful money to the extent of the wages assigned. The objections taken to the act by the appellant are that it contravenes § 1, art. 1, of the state Constitution, which declares that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness are unalienable rights; and that it violates § 23, art. 1, of the Constitution, which prohibits the general assembly from granting to any citizen or class of citizens privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not belong equally to all citizens. We do not deem it necessary to determine the question whether the act before us unduly restricts the right of the citizens of this state to contract, or whether its practical effect may not be to take private property without due process of law. We shall consider the act solely with reference to that clause of the Constitution which interdicts class legislation, or the grant to any citizen or class of citizens, of special privileges or special immunities. The body of the act mentions and includes "any merchant or dealer in goods or merchandise, or any other person," upon the one hand, and "any employee or laborer for wages who labors in and about any coal mine in this state" upon the other. So far, then, as the classification first mentioned is concerned, it is comprehensive enough to include all of the citizens of the state, treating all alike, conferring no special privileges or immunities upon any, and subjecting none to restrictions in trade or business, to deprivation of property rights, or to penalties which are not equally and impartially imposed upon all other citizens similarly situated. But an examination of the title of the act discloses that its subject, as expressed therein, is not coextensive with the act itself. It is in these words: "An Act Concerning the Issuance of Checks, Tickets, Tokens, or Other Devices Payable in Merchandise, or Anything Other Than Lawful Money by Merchants, in Payment for the Assignment or Transfer of Wages of Employees in Coal Mines, and Repealing All Laws in Conflict Therewith." So that, as the title refers only to merchants who issue "checks, tickets, tokens, or other devices," no persons, natural or artificial, can be brought within the scope of the act who do not belong to the particular class designated in the title as "merchants." Const. art. 4, § 19; Meuchter v. Price, 11 Ind. 199; State v. Bowser, 14 Ind. 195; State v. Young, 47 Ind. 150. The statute, therefore, must be treated as an enactment operative only upon two classes of persons,—merchants and employees in coal mines. All other persons, copartnerships, and corporations in the state may issue checks, tickets, tokens, or other devices payable in merchandise, or anything other than lawful money, in payment for the transfer of the wages of employees in coal mines, but no merchant in this state is permitted to do so. The mechanic, the farmer, the professional man, the banker or broker may lawfully take an assignment of the wages of the coal miner, and, in consideration of such transfer, may issue to the miner a check, ticket, or token payable only in merchandise, work, produce, professional services, or depreciated notes or currency. The merchant must redeem his check, ticket, or token in gold, silver, United States treasury notes, or other lawful money of the United States. By confining the prohibitory terms of the statute to merchants, and exempting all other persons, natural and artificial, from their operation; by declaring void the agreement of the merchant, but leaving the same kind of contract valid as to the farmer, mechanic, or banker; by permitting one class of citizens to pay their debts in merchandise, but requiring another, under precisely the same circumstances, to pay in lawful money only,—the act undeniably confers valuable privileges on the mechanic, farmer, professional man, banker, and broker, and denies them to the merchant. Total immunity from the restrictions, inconveniences, and losses resulting and intended to result from the statute is granted to one class, and is impliedly withheld from another. Is a distribution of the citizens of the state in an act concerning the transfer of a claim for wages, which puts the merchants of the state in one class and all other citizens in another, a reasonable and constitutional arrangement? Could an act of the legislature which authorized a judgment without stay of execution or exemption upon an account or claim due to any merchant be upheld against the objection that this was a privilege granted to merchants as a class, and which could not, upon the same terms, be enjoyed by the other citizens of the state? Or would an act stand which fixed the amount of property to be set off to every merchant as exempt from execution at $1,000, while it limited exemptions to the other citizens to $600? Such a classification would be regarded by every one as unnatural, and in violation of the provision of the Constitution prohibiting such distinctions. Again, is the classification of the supposed beneficiaries of the act a reasonable and legal one? They are described as “any employee or laborer for wages who labor in and about any coal mine in this state.” This classification seems to rest upon no sound or proper basis. Laborers and employees engaged in a particular industry, who are no less intelligent and no less competent to care for their own interests than laborers and employees pursuing other occupations, are by the statute singled out and authorized to avoid their express agreements, when, under like circumstances, such other laborers and employees enjoy no such privilege. The law does not embrace all of the class to which it is naturally related. It creates a preference, and establishes an inequality among a class of citizens all of whom are equally meritorious. It applies to persons in certain situations, and excludes from its effect other persons who are not dissimilar in these respects. Leaving the miner and the merchant free to deal with all other citizens, the act disqualifies them from contracting with each other. State ex rel. Van Riper v. Parsons, 40 N. J. L. 1; Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Robinson, 157 Ind. 232, 236, 61 N. E. 197; Breuer v. McClelland, 144 Ind. 423, 17 L. R. A. 845, 32 N. E. 299; State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, 6 L. R. 60 L. R. A.

It is said by Judge Cooley (Const. Lim. 393): “The doubt might also arise whether a regulation made for any one class of citizens, entirely arbitrary in its character, and restricting their rights, privileges, or legal capacities in a manner before unknown to the law, could be sustained notwithstanding its generality. Distinctions in these respects must rest upon some reason upon which they can be defended,—like the want of capacity in infants and insane persons; and, if the legislature should undertake to provide that persons following some specified lawful trade or employment should not have capacity to make contracts, or to receive conveyances, or to build such houses as others were allowed to erect, or in any other way to make such use of their property as was permissible to others, it can scarcely be doubted that the act would transcend the due bounds of legislative power, even though no express constitutional provision could be pointed out with which it would come in conflict. To forbid to an individual or a class the right to the acquisition or enjoyment of property in such manner as should be permitted to the community at large would be to deprive them of liberty in particulars of primary importance to their ‘pursuit of happiness,’ and those who should claim a right to do so ought to be able to show a specific authority therefor, instead of calling upon others to show how and where the authority is negatived.” The statute under review does undertake to provide that persons following the lawful trade of merchants shall not have capacity to make certain contracts, or to receive certain transfers of personal property which are entirely permissible to others. It also, and in a manner quite as offensive to the Constitution, confers privileges and immunities upon employees and laborers in coal mines which are not possessed by other citizens of this state employed as laborers in other occupations. We do not wish to be understood as saying that statutes free from any constitutional infirmity may not be enacted which apply exclusively to merchants, coal miners, bankers, physicians, dairymen, druggists, or persons engaged in other particular occupations. Such a classification may, in some cases, be a legitimate one. But in every instance of this kind where such statutes have been upheld the classification has rested upon some quality, condition, or state of things peculiar to the occupation itself, or upon some consideration of public policy, which made it proper or necessary to regulate, control, license, tax, or prohibit it. State ex rel. Walker v. Green, 112 Ind. 462, 14 N. E. 352; Wilkins v. State, 113 Ind. 514, 16 N. E. 192; Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 58 Am. Rep. 400, 10 N. E. 97; Blair v. Kilpatrick, 40 Ind. 312; State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L. R. A. 313, 44 N. E. 469; Ferner v. State, 151 Ind. 247, 51 N. E. 360; Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327, 17 Am. Rep. 738; State ex rel. Burroughs v. Webster, 150 Ind. 607, 41 L. R. A. 212, 50 N. E. 750; Parks v. State (Ind.) 59 L. R. A. 190, 64 N. E. 862.

We have found no case sustaining a statute which prohibited an individual engaged in a particular, lawful occupation, and not under special disability, such an infancy, insanity, or the like, from doing an act not necessarily connected with his business, which every other citizen was by law permitted to do. The only case referred to by counsel for appellee in support of their contention that the act of 1901, supra, is valid, is Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L. R. A. 576, 23 N. E. 253. The question there was whether the legislature could prohibit men from contracting in advance to accept payment in something other than the lawful money of the country for the wages they might earn in the future. It was held that the acts prohibiting such contracts were within the scope of legislative power. The acts referred to in that case applied to any owner, corporation, association, company, firm, or person engaged in mining coal, ore, or minerals, or quarrying stone, or in manufacturing iron, steel, lumber, staves, heading barrels, brick, tile, machinery, agricultural implements, or any article of merchandise; and, as its beneficiaries, it embraced "any persons" executing a contract or agreement to waive his or her legal right to demand or receive from such owner, corporation, etc., at least once every two weeks, payment of the amount due to such persons for labor performed, in lawful money of the United States. Acts 1887, p. 13; Acts 1889, p. 191; Elliott's Supp. §§ 1599, 1610. No question as to an improper classification seems to have been made, and the act applied to all persons and corporations in this state engaged in mining, quarrying, or manufacturing, and to every one in their employment. The point decided in that case was the power of the legislature to restrict the right to contract for a waiver of the benefit of the statute. The question before us under the act of 1901 is the constitutionality of the classification adopted. Hancock v. Yaden, 121 Ind. 366, 6 L. R. A. 576, 23 N. E. 253, has no application to this question, and throws no light upon it. It is with great reluctance that we declare an act of the legislature invalid; but the act of 1901, supra, so plainly violates the rule of the Constitution forbidding the grant of special privileges and immunities to a favored class of citizens, and subjecting another class to special disabilities and restrictions, that we have no choice but to adjudge it void.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

C. L. PEMBERTON, Appt.,

v.

William B. DEAN et al., Respts.

(.....Minn.....)

*Defendants, wholesale and retail dealers in hardware, purchased from the manufacturer thereof an emery wheel, upon which the manufacturer had placed a placard, which it is assumed constituted a warranty as to the speed capacity of the wheel. Defendants placed it in their stock, and sold it to plaintiff in the same condition it was when received from the manufacturer, but without any express representation as to its capacity or otherwise. Held, that defendants, by such sale, did not adopt the warranty of the manufacturer as their own.

(December 12, 1902.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a motion for new trial after judgment in defendants' favor in an action to recover damages for alleged breach of warranty of an emery wheel. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Humphrey Barton and John E. Samuelson, for appellant:

This action being one for a breach of con-

Respondents cannot shield themselves with the rule of caveat emptor. Here was an article that was manufactured and placed upon the market for sale, to be used for the particular and specific purpose for which it was made; and in such a case there is an implied warranty that it is fit for such use or purpose.

Cosgrove v. Bennett, 32 Minn. 371, 20 N. W. 359; French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440.

There was an express, unequivocal warranty that the emery wheel was good for 1800 revolutions per minute. The seller allowed the warranty to remain upon the wheel; the purchaser bought and conducted himself in accordance with that warranty. The respondents cannot, therefore, now come in and say: We did not mean to warrant when we left the warranty there.

There may be circumstances in which silence would have the legal characteristics of actual misrepresentation.

French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440.

The warranty upon the wheel was not the warranty of the manufacturer as far as appellant was concerned, but a direct warranty of respondents.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover damages for the breach of a warranty alleged to have been given on the sale by defendants to plaintiff of a certain emery wheel. The court below dismissed the action at the trial, and plaintiff appealed from an order denying a new trial.

The facts are as follows: At the time stated in the complaint, and for a number of years prior thereto, plaintiff was, and had been, engaged in the business of blacksmithing, in and about which business it was necessary to make use of an emery wheel for the purpose of sharpening tools. On the 1st of October, 1901, he purchased of defendants such a wheel, and removed it to his place of business, and there made use of it. About October 30th of the same year, when engaged in operating the wheel in sharpening tools, the same broke, and a piece therefrom struck plaintiff, and severely injured his person. The complaint alleges that defendants represented and warranted, at the time of the sale of the wheel, that the same was well made, of good material, and capable of making 1,800 revolutions per minute; and that plaintiff relied upon such representations and warranty in making the purchase. This action was brought for damages, on the theory that the injury to plaintiff was the direct result of a defect in the wheel, and that defendants were liable as for a breach of the alleged warranty.

The only question we deem necessary to consider is whether the evidence establishes the allegations of the complaint that defendants warranted the wheel at the time of the sale. It was not manufactured by defendants, who were wholesale and retail dealers in heavy hardware, and kept wheels of the kind in stock for sale to the trade; but was manufactured by the Northampton Emery Wheel Company, of Massachusetts, from which company defendants purchased it, with others, in the usual course of trade. A printed card was placed by the manufacturers upon the face of the wheel, which contained the words "Northampton Emery Wheel Co.," the word "Speed," and opposite thereto the figures "1,800," indicating, as claimed by plaintiff, that the wheel was capable of being safely operated at the rate of 1,800 revolutions per minute. There were other words upon the card, together with the word "Warranted." This card was upon the wheel at the time it was purchased by plaintiff, and the contention of plaintiff is that the same constituted and amounted to a warranty on the part of defendants in respect to its quality and speed capacity; that, although it may have been placed upon the wheel by the manufacturers, defendants adopted it as their own by making the sale without removing it therefrom. Conceding that the printed matter upon the face of the wheel was sufficient to constitute a warranty, we are unable to concur in the contention that it was the warranty of defendants. A warranty consists in representations and statements of and concerning the condition and quality of personal property, the subject of sale, made by the person making the sale to induce and bring it about. So far as the evidence in the case at bar shows, nothing whatever was said between the plaintiff and defendants concerning the condition or quality of this wheel, whether it was capable of making 1,800 revolutions per minute, or any other number of revolutions, or as to whether it was fit and suitable for any particular purpose. Attention was not called by either party to the alleged printed warranty, and, for aught that appears from the record, the same was not noticed by either at the time of the sale. Clearly, under such circumstances, the placard cannot be held to be the warranty of defendants, and to hold that they adopted the representations purporting to be thus made would be going far beyond any case to which our attention has been called. Whether the manufacturers would be liable to plaintiff upon this warranty, either upon the ground of neglect in the manufacture of the wheel or for a breach of warranty, is wholly irrelevant to the question. If it be granted that the manufacturers would not be liable, it by no means follows that defendants are. We are clear that the mere sale of the wheel by defendants with the printed matter pasted thereon, without other act or ceremony, did not amount to an express warranty on their part. The allegations of the complaint are not, therefore, sustained by the evidence, and the court correctly dismissed the action.

Neither can plaintiff recover upon the theory of an implied warranty. It may be, and doubtless is, true that there is an implied warranty in all cases where an article is manufactured and sold for a specific purpose that such article is fit and suitable for the purposes intended for it. But that rule can have no application to the case at bar, for plaintiff relies in his complaint, not upon an implied, but upon an express, warranty; and, besides, defendants were not the manufacturers of the wheel.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

(November 19, 1902.)

ERROR to the District Court for Cedar County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of defendant's son, for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. J. C. Robinson, for plaintiff in error:

If the act is done while the servant is at liberty from his service, and pursuing his own ends exclusively, there can be no question of the master's freedom from all responsibility, even though the injury complained of could not have been committed without the facilities afforded to the servant by his relation to his master.

Mr. Benjamin M. Weed also for defendants in error.

Ames, C., filed the following opinion:

This is a proceeding in error to review a judgment in an action for damages for personal injuries. The facts out of which the cause of action arose are substantially undisputed, and are these: The plaintiff in error, Alois Weber, Sr., was living upon and cultivating a farm upon which there was a herd of cattle belonging to him. As a part of the business thus being carried on, it was necessary, or desired, to drive the cattle to a place some 5 or 6 miles from home, and put them there in a pasture. There were employed upon the farm, besides the plaintiff in error, his son, Alois, Jr., and a hired servant named Schweimer. At the breakfast table on a Sunday morning it was proposed to drive the animals to pasture on that day, so as to avoid interruption of work during the coming week, but the elder Weber objected to this course solely on account of the character of the day. There was no further discussion of the matter until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when Alois, Jr., and Schweimer mounted some horses, and, turning the cattle into the public highway, drove them to the designated place of destination. Weber, Sr., was at or shortly before this time in his house asleep, and did not know of the conduct of the young men until after they had departed from the premises with the cattle. After the animals had been turned into the pasture, Alois, Jr., abandoned the direct road home, and made a detour of about a mile for the purpose of seeing and visiting with some young men of his acquaintance. Owing to the delay thus occasioned, he did not resume his journey homeward until nightfall, when he did so accompanied by another young man, also on horseback. When he was within 1½ or 2 miles from home, and apparently upon the direct road thither, he had been overtaken by darkness, and, both horses having become unmanageable from fright or some other cause, ran rapidly along the road and down a hillside near the residence of the defendant in error, whom they encountered in the highway, and whom the horse ridden by Alois ran over, causing the injuries on account of which the judgment was recovered. The court left it to the jury to say: First, whether the accident was attributable solely to the negligence of Alois; and, second, whether, if so, such negligence should be imputed to the plaintiff in error as a master in the course of whose service it occurred. The first question was one peculiarly within the province of the jury, and will not be further considered. The correct answer to the second question is, we think, not difficult. The purpose of the elder Weber to have the cattle driven to the pasture as a part of the business he was carrying on is not in dispute. The only objection he made was as to the time when they should be driven, but he does not appear to have positively forbidden it to be done on the day mentioned. Even if he had done so, he would not thus have deprived the act of its character of having been done in his service. Disobedience in this regard would not have been different, as respects its effect upon his liability, than would disobedience to his directions as to the manner of driving the animals or the route to be taken. Such disobedience is universally held not to excuse a master from responsibility for the negligence of his servants. Cosgrove v. Ogden, 49 N. Y. 255, 10 Am. Rep. 361; Ellegard v. Ackland, 43 Minn. 352, 45 N. W. 715; Fitzsimmons v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 98 Mich. 257, 57 N. W. 127; Cleveland v. Newson, 45 Mich. 62, 7 N. W. 222. The same principle applies to what occurred after the delivery of the cattle at the pasture. The boy was a minor, riding his father's horse. It was his duty, after having executed his mission, to return the animal to his father's stables. Whatever negligence there was in departing from the direct route, or in delaying his return until after nightfall, or in the management of the horse at the time of the accident, was committed in the performance of this duty and service. And, besides, it does not appear that his departure from the direct route was in itself negligent, or that his visit to the young people in any way contributed to an accident which did not occur until after the visits had ended and he had resumed his homeward journey, and thus returned to the strict line of his employment. If the fact of delay until after nightfall contributed to the mishap, it was that mere fact, and not the occasion for it, which did so. If it was negligent for the boy to ride after dark, it is immaterial what induced him to incur the risk. We are satisfied that the answer given by the jury to this question is the only one which the evidence in the record is capable of supporting. The conclusion thus reached renders unnecessary the consideration of assignments of error in the giving and refusal of instructions. The question of negligence was rightly left to the jury, and the inference that it occurred in the service of the plaintiff in error is inevitable.

It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

Albert and Duffie, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment of the District Court be affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Louis BECK, Respt.,
v.
CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY OF AMERICA,
Appt.,
And Augustus C. DEXTER et al., Respts.

(172 N. Y. 387.)

Consent to the erection of buildings on the land within the meaning of the mechanics' lien law, so as to make the property liable for liens after the contract has been forfeited and the vendor has resumed possession, is not shown by a clause in an executory land contract "that the vendee shall have a right to immediate possession" for the purpose of erecting buildings.

NOTE.—For a case in this series holding that the insertion in a contract for sale of real estate of a clause requiring vendee to erect buildings thereon sufficiently shows vendor's consent to such erection, so as to render his interest in 60 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by the defendant University from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce a mechanic's lien. Reversed.

Statement by the Court:

The action was to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon real property owned by the appellant, situated on Riverside drive, in the city of New York. It consisted of six lots, which the appellant, by an executory contract, sold to the defendant Dexter for $100,000. Dexter employed the plaintiff to erect a building for a restaurant thereon, and out of this employment the plaintiff's claim arose, for which he filed a mechanic's the property liable for liens for labor and material, see Miller v. Mead (N. Y.) 13 L. R. A. 701. With this case is a note reviewing the cases on the New York mechanics' lien law.

lien, and which he sought by this action to foreclose. Several of the defendants filed liens against the property, which they also sought to enforce in this action. In December, 1897, Dexter defaulted in payment under his contract, his right to the property ceased, and the university took possession thereof. The building upon the premises was constructed while Dexter was in possession. The plaintiff recovered a judgment awarding him a lien thereon for $9,020.32, the defendant, Hamilton, for $614.56, and the defendants, Mackey and Smith, for the sum of $785. The judgment of the special term was affirmed by a divided court.

Mr. Joseph M. Proskauer, with Messrs. James, Schell, & Elkus, for appellant:

The mere acquiescence in the erection or alteration of a building, with knowledge, is not sufficient evidence of consent, which the statute requires.

The contract contained merely a permission, not a consent.

Where the owner merely gives permission to build, and has no interest in the building, and does not look to it for profit, and does not care whether the building is erected or not, under such circumstances no consent can be inferred.

Mr. Dahlgren neither assumed to bind the university, nor did the university ever grant him any authority, and the few stray statements relied upon by the respondents to indicate his assumption of authority are, as the mere declarations of the agent, insufficient to prove the fact of his agency.

PER CURIAM:

The judgment appealed from should be reversed. The mechanics' liens involved in this action were filed against property now owned by the Catholic University of America. The appellant insists that the labor and materials furnished, for which liens were filed, were not furnished either with its consent or at its request, although its property has been held liable therefor. It is not even pretended that the university requested the performance of the labor or the furnishing of the materials employed in the erection of the building upon the appellant's land. Nor do we think there was any such consent as is contemplated by the statute relating to the subject. We fully concur with the learned appellate division in the opinion that no consent by the university was established by the parol evidence in the case, as it was not proved that Dahlgren was a general agent of the university, nor was he shown to have been authorized by it to do anything concerning the erection of such building. Consequently no inference of authority or consent can be drawn from the testimony as to his acts or declarations. The only ground upon which the appellate division held that the university consented to the erection of buildings on its land is that the contract of sale effected such consent. The provision upon which that court relied as constituting consent was as follows: "It is further understood and agreed that the vendee shall have the right of immediate possession to the property hereinbefore mentioned and described for the purpose of erecting buildings thereon." Obviously, the only effect of that provision was to give the vendee the right of possession, which he would not otherwise have had, and it cannot be regarded as a consent under the provisions of the lien law to the erection of the building constructed by Dexter. It is to be observed that, while there was consent by the vendor that the vendee should have the right of possession for the purpose of erecting buildings thereon, there was no consent whatever to the construction of the particular building erected. It is quite evident that the university had knowledge of the fact that the defendant Dexter intended to improve the property by the erection of a building thereon. There was, however, no proof of any knowledge upon its part as to the character of the building to be erected, of the erection of the building constructed, or that the university acquiesced therein. Proof of the existence of that knowledge was insufficient to establish a consent, under the lien law, to the erection of any building which the vendee should conclude to or did erect. The decision of the learned appellate division in that respect is in direct conflict with the later decisions of this court. Vosseller v. Slater, 25 App. Div. 368, 372, 49 N. Y.
